DELIVERED-PRICE SYSTEMS AND FREIGHT-ABSORPTION PRACTICES

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter I have received from James G. Patton, president of the Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union.

Mr. Patton, in this letter, very ably points out the adverse way in which the farmer and small business would be affected by S. 1008, to provide a 2-year moratorium with respect to the application of certain antitrust laws to individual, good-faith, delivered-price systems, and freight-absorption practices. Many small-business men in North Dakota take almost exactly the same position with respect to S. 1008 as does Mr. Patton.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARMERS EDUCATIONAL AND COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1950.

Senator MILTON R. YOUNG,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR YOUNG: I am writing you in regard to S. 1008 which, I understand, the Senate is taking up late this week. This legislation as it now stands is the result of action taken by the House, by the Senate, and by the conferees.

As approved by the Senate, S. 1008 contained the Kefauver amendments which provided that price discriminations should not be practiced if there were a reasonable probability that competition might be injured. As approved by the House, S. 1008 contained the Carroll amendments which also safeguarded competition. The conferees in considering S. 1008 saw fit to violate the wishes of both Houses. Clauses safeguarding competition were deleted from section 3 and in 4 d the definition of "may be," which has been defined by the courts as "reasonable probability" was changed to "substantial and probative evidence."

Taken together, these two changes made by the conferees in the Clayton Act mean that as long as two sellers are competing all price discriminations are legalized if there is no element of conspiracy even though such discriminations put out of business every small business and cooperative in the land. To give a concrete example: If the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. and the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., which account for about half the capital assets of the tire industry, chose they could give discounts to various selected buyers on the ground that they were meeting each other's competition. They could, for example, give discounts to all tire distributors except the Farmers Union Central Exchange. They could, by this method, pick off our cooperatives one by one until the members of the Farmers Union were denied the right to buy cooperatively.

Not only would the enactment of S. 1008, as amended by the conference report, make it possible for the big duopolies and oligopolies to put out of business all cooperatives but all small businesses as well. As long as one big business could find a dancing partner to go through the motions of competition every discrimination under the sun would be legal. Thus, in the name of free competition free competition would be murdered. Thus would our system of free enterprise come to an end.

I am, therefore, urging you to vote against S. 1008 and to use your great efforts to influence other Senators to do likewise. I know, Senator, that you have the interests of our country at heart and therefore feel confident that you will not vote to approve the conference report. My only fear is that Members of the Senate may be preoccupied with other legislation, with hearings being carried on by various committees, with foreign policy decisions and other affairs of state when S. 1008 reaches the floor. I sincerely hope this does not happen. As pointed out above, approval of S. 1008 would be a disaster of the first magnitude.

With best personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JAMES G. PATTON,
President.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following report of a committee was submitted:

By Mr. THOMAS of Utah, from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

S. Res. 215. Resolution authorizing the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to employ additional personnel; without amendment; and under the rule, referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

REPORT ON PERSONNEL AND FUNDS BY COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE

ELBERT D. THOMAS,
Chairman.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FREAR:

S. 2901. A bill to repeal the prohibition against the filling of a vacancy in the office of district judge for the district of Delaware; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ELLENDER:

S. 2902. A bill to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado:

S. 2903. A bill to provide for the promotion of certain retired officers of the Regular Navy recalled to active duty during World War II, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

S. 2904. A bill for the relief of Peter T. Revesz; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. THYE introduced Senate bill 2905, to extend until July 1, 1951, import control powers with respect to fats and oils and rice and rice products, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. EASTLAND:

S. 2906. A bill to authorize and direct the conveyance of a certain tract of land in the State of Mississippi to Louis Emfinger; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. MAGNUSON:

S. 2907. A bill to provide for the coinage of a 3-cent piece; and

S. 2908. A bill to provide for the coinage of a 7-cent piece; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

(Mr. TOBEY (for himself, Mr. HILL, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. TAFT, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. CORDON,

Mr. MORSE, Mr. MUNDT, Mr. HUMPHREY, and Mr. SCHOEPPEL) introduced Senate bill 2909, to amend Veterans Regulation No. 1 (a) with respect to the computation of estimated costs of teaching personnel and supplies for instruction in the case of colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts and other nonprofit educational institutions, which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. MURRAY:

S. 2910. A bill for the relief of Werner Plack; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN IMPORT CONTROL POWERS

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to extend until July 1, 1951, the authority of the President to control imports of fats and oils—including oil-bearing materials, fatty acids, butter, soap, and soap powder, but excluding petroleum and petroleum products—and rice and rice products, under the provisions of the Second Decontrol Act of 1947, as amended.

Under Public Law 155, first session, Eighty-first Congress, this authority will expire on July 1 of this year. In view of our surpluses, world shortages, and the importance of orderly liquidation of stocks of these products owned or controlled by the Federal Government, it is essential that this authority should be continued as provided in the bill which I now introduce.

The bill (S. 2905) to extend until July 1, 1951, import control powers with respect to fats and oils and rice and rice products, introduced by Mr. THYE, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

PRINTING OF COMMITTEE PRINT ENTITLED "MONETARY, CREDIT, AND FISCAL POLICIES"

Mr. O'MAHONEY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 216), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the committee print, entitled "Monetary, Credit, and Fiscal Policies," prepared for the use of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, be printed as a Senate document.

INCREASE IN LIMIT OF EXPENDITURES FOR INVESTIGATION OF FIELD OF LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

Mr. THOMAS of Utah (for himself, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. PEPPER, Mr. HILL, Mr. NEELY, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. LEHMAN, Mr. TAFT, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. SMITH of New Jersey, Mr. MORSE, and Mr. DONNELL), submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 217), which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare through its subcommittee appointed pursuant to Senate Resolution 140 (Rept. No. 827) (Rept. No. 894) Eighty-first Congress, agreed to August 15, 1949, is hereby authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate $108,000 in addition to the amounts heretofore authorized for the same purposes.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah, from the Committe on Labor and Public Welfare, to which was referred the foregoing resolution (S. Res. 217), reported it without amendment, and, under the rule, referred it to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

FOREIGN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES—ADDRESS BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, on January 12 the Honorable Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, delivered an address before the National Press Club. He was also interrogated. This is a brilliant and illuminating document. It really challenges comparison. I ask unanimous consent that the address, along with the questions and answers, be incorporated in the body of the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the address and questions and answers were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, members and guests of the National Press Club, I stand before you in the tattered remains of my reputation as a lawyer. (The president of the National Press Club, Mr. John O'Brien, in his introduction referred to a biographical sketch of Mr. Acheson at the time of his appointment as Assistant Secretary of State, which stated, "He came to this position with the reputation of a first-rate lawyer, a reputation he still has.") I think anybody who permits me to speak with them on the subject of foreign affairs has their courage in their hands.

The president (again referring to Mr. O'Brien's introduction) has perhaps given a wrong impression of the proceedings in the last few days. I think it is unfair to my friends and colleagues on the Hill to believe that they kept me. The question as to who kept whom is one which is still open.

In talking with you today, I shall try to avoid the sin of dogmatism, and if I do not avoid it I shall leave myself fairly open to your chastisement. I have been in this business of foreign relations too long to believe that anyone can be sure about results. I have been dealing with the subject matter that I am going to talk with you about today too short a time to believe that my judgments are infallible. In fact, I don't believe that anybody's judgments are infallible. And so when I read, as I read in the press this morning, the words of the distinguished statesman who said that there was no doubt that if there had been sincere aid given to the Government of China some years ago, there would have been no difficulty, I was interested to observe the introduction of the word "sincere" which, of course, raises all possibilities of argument: Was the aid given with tongue in cheek? Was it insincere? But the interesting point was that there was no doubt if some kind of aid had been given an inevitable result would have happened.

He then moved from the area of no doubt to the area of possible doubt and he said as time went on to be sure there was doubt whether aid could be successful. But with that slight concession to fallibility, he then moved back to the area of no doubt and he said, but now there is no doubt whatever that aid, and very small aid, can solve the problem in Formosa. I was interested at the courage of a person who can allocate to the area of doubt and no doubt with such assurance, and my mind went back to a man whom you all know, one of the most beloved characters who has ever lived in Washington, Mr. Justice Hitz, who practiced law here for many years and was on our district court and on our court of appeals. I remember Justice Hitz from the bench one day replying to a lawyer who was arguing some dogmatism before him and the old justice said: "My friend, this court is often in error but never in doubt."

This afternoon I should like to discuss with you the relations between the peoples of the United States and the peoples of Asia, and I used the words "relations of the peoples of the United States and the peoples of Asia" advisedly. I am not talking about governments or nations because it seems to me what I want to discuss with you is this feeling of mind that the relations depend upon the attitudes of the peoples; that there are fundamental attitudes, fundamental interests, fundamental purposes of the people of the United States, 150 million of them, and of the peoples of Asia, unnumbered millions, which determine and out of which grow the relations of our countries and the policies of our governments. Out of these attitudes and interests and purposes grow what we do from day to day.

Now, let's dispose of one idea right at the start and not bother with it any more. That is that the policies of the United States are determined out of abstract in the Department of State or in the White House or in the Congress. That is not the case. If these policies are going to be good, they must grow out of the fundamental attitudes of our people on both sides. If they are to be effective they must become articulate through all the institutions of our national life, of which this is one of the greatest—through the press, through the radio, through the churches, through the labor unions, through the business organizations, through all the groupings of our national life, there must become articulate the attitudes of our people and the policies which we propose to follow. It seems to me that understanding is the beginning of wisdom and, therefore, we shall begin by trying to understand before we announce what we are going to do, and that is a proposition so heretical in this town that I advance it with some hesitation.

Now, let's consider some of the basic factors which go into the making of the attitudes of the peoples on both sides. I am frequently asked: Has the State Department got an Asian policy? And it seems to me that that discloses such a depth of ignorance that it is very hard to begin to deal with it. The people of Asia are so incredibly diverse and their problems are so incredibly diverse that how could anyone, even the most utter charlatan, believe that he had a uniform policy which would deal with all of them. On the other hand, there are very important similarities in ideas and in problems among the peoples of Asia, and so what we come to, after we understand these diversities and these common attitudes of mind, is the fact that there must be certain similarities of approach and there must be very great dissimilarities in action.

To illustrate this only a moment: If you will consider as an example of the differences in Asia the subcontinent of India and Pakistan you will find there an area which is roughly comparable in size and population to Europe. You will find that the different states and provinces of that subcontinent are roughly comparable in size to the nations of Europe, and yet you will find such differences in race, in ideas, in languages and religion and culture that, compared to that subcontinent, Europe is almost one homogeneous people.

Or take the difference, for instance, between the people and problems of Japan and Indonesia, both in the same Asian area. In Japan, you have a people far advanced in the complexities of industrial civilization, a people whose problems grow out of overpopulation on small islands and the necessity of finding raw materials to bring in and finding markets for the finished goods which they produce. In Indonesia, you find something wholly different—a people on the very threshold of their experience with these complexities and a people who live in an area which possesses vast resources which are awaiting development. Now, those are illustrations of complexities.

Let's come now to the matters which Asia has in common. There is in this vast area what we might call a developing Asian consciousness, and a developing pattern, and this, I think, is based upon two factors which are pretty nearly common to the entire experience of all these Asian people.

One of these factors is a revulsion against the acceptance of misery and poverty as the normal condition of life. Throughout all of this vast area, you have that fundamental revolutionary aspect in mind and belief. The other common aspect that they have is the revulsion against foreign domination. Whether that foreign domination takes the form of colonialism or whether it takes the form of imperialism, they are through with it. They have had enough of it and they want no more.

These two basic ideas which are held so broadly and commonly in Asia tend to fuse in the minds of many Asian peoples, and many of them tend to believe that if you could get rid of foreign domination, if you could gain independence, then the relief from poverty and misery would follow almost in course. It is easy to point out that that is not true, and, of course, they are discovering that it is not true. But underneath that belief there was a very profound understanding of a basic truth, and it is the basic truth which underlies all our democratic belief and all our democratic concept. That truth is that just as no man and no government is wise enough or disinterested enough to direct the thinking and the action of another individual, so no nation and no people are wise enough and disinterested enough very long to assume the responsibility for another people or to control another people's opportunities.

That great truth they have sensed, and on that great truth they are acting. They say and they believe that from now on they are on their own. They will make their own decisions. They will attempt to better their own lot, and on occasion they will make their own mistakes. But it will be their mistakes, and they are not going to have their mistakes dictated to them by anybody else.

The symbol of these concepts has become nationalism. National independence has become the symbol both of freedom from foreign domination and freedom from the tyranny of poverty and misery.

Since the end of the war in Asia, we have seen over 500,000,000 people gain their independence and over seven new nations come into existence in this area.

We have the Philippines with 20,000,000 citizens. We have Pakistan, India, Ceylon, and Burma with 400,000,000 citizens, southern Korea with 20,000,000, and within the last few weeks, the United States of Indonesia with 75,000,000.

This is the outward and visible sign of the internal ferment of Asia. But this ferment and change is not restricted to these countries which are just gaining their independence. It is the common idea and the common pattern of Asia, and as I tried to suggest a moment ago, it is not based on purely political conceptions. It is not based purely on ideological conceptions. It is based on a fundamental and an earthy and a deeply individual realization of the problems of their own daily lives. This new sense of nationalism means that they are going to deal with those daily problems—the problems of the relation of man to the soil, the problem of how much can be exacted from them by the tax collectors of the state. It is rooted in those ideas. With those ideas they are going forward. Resignation is no longer the typical emotion of Asia. It has given way to hope, to a sense of effort, and, in many cases, to a real sense of anger.

Now, may I suggest to you that much of the bewilderment which has seized the minds of many of us about recent developments in China comes from a failure to understand this basic revolutionary force which is loose in Asia. The reasons for the fall of the Nationalist Government in China are preoccupying many people. All sorts of reasons have been attributed to it. Most commonly it is said in various speeches and publications that it is the result of American bungling, that we are incompetent, that we did not understand, that American aid was too little, that we did the wrong things at the wrong time. Other people go on and say: "No, it is not quite that, but that an American general did not like Chiang Kai-shek and out of all that relationship grows the real trouble." And they say: "Well, you have to add to that there are a lot of women fooling around in politics in China."

Nobody, I think, says that the Nationalist Government fell because it was confronted by overwhelming military force which it could not resist. Certainly no one in his right mind suggests that. Now, what I ask you to do is to stop looking for a moment under the bed and under the chair and under the rug to find out these reasons, but rather to look at the broad picture and see whether something doesn't suggest itself.

The broad picture is that after the war, Chiang Kai-shek emerged as the undisputed leader of the Chinese people. Only one faction, the Communists, up in the hills, ill-equipped, ragged, a very small military force, was determinedly opposed to his position. He had overwhelming military power, greater military power than any ruler had ever had in the entire history of China. He had tremendous economic and military support and backing from the United States. He had the acceptance of all other foreign countries, whether sincerely or insincerely in the case of the Soviet Union is not really material to this matter. Here he was in this position and 4 years later what do we find? We find that his armies have melted away. His support in the country has melted away. His support largely outside the country has melted away and he is a refugee on a small island off the coast of China with the remnants of his forces.

As I said, no one says that vast armies moved out of the hills and defeated him. To attribute this to the inadequacy of American aid is only to point out the depth and power of the forces which were miscalculated or ignored. What has happened, in my judgment, is that the almost inexhaustible patience of the Chinese people in their misery ended. They did not bother to overthrow this government. There was really nothing to overthrow. They simply ignored it throughout the country. They took the solution of their immediate village problems into their own hands. If there was any trouble or interference with the representatives of the government, they simply brushed them aside. They completely withdrew their support from this government and when that support was withdrawn, the whole military establishment disintegrated. Added to the grossest incompetence ever experienced by any military command was this total lack of support both in the armies and in the country, and so the whole matter just simply disintegrated.

The Communists did not create this. The Communists did not create this condition. They did not create this revolutionary spirit. They did not create a great force which moved out from under Chiang Kai-shek. But they were shrewd and cunning to mount it, to ride this thing into victory and into power.

That, I suggest to you, is an explanation which has certain roots and realism and which does not require all this examination of intricate and perhaps irrelevant details. So much for the attitudes of the peoples of Asia.

Let's consider for a moment another important factor in this relationship. That is the attitude of our own people to Asia. What is that fundamental attitude out of which our policy has grown? What is the history of it? Because history is very important and history furnishes the belief on the one side in the reality and truth of the attitude.

What has our attitude been toward the people of Asia? It has been, I submit to you, that we are interested—that Americans as individuals are interested in the peoples of Asia. We are not interested in them as pawns or as subjects for exploitation but just as people.

For 100 years some Americans have gone to Asia to bring in what they thought was the most valuable thing they had—their faith. They wanted to tell them what they thought about the nature and relationship of man to God. Others went to them to bring to them what they knew of learning. Others went to them to bring them healing for their bodies. Others and perhaps fewer went to them to learn the depth and beauty of their own cultures and some went to them to trade and they traded with them. But this trade was a very small part of American interest in the Far East and it was a very small part of American interest in trade. It was a valid interest, it was a good interest. There was nothing wrong about it, but out of the total sum of the interests of the American people in Asia, it was a comparatively small part.

Through all this period of time, also, we had, and still have, great interests in Asia. But let me point out to you one very important factor about our interests in Asia. That is that our interests have been parallel to the interests of the people of Asia. For 50 years it has been the fundamental belief of the American people—and I am not talking about announcements of government, but I mean a belief of people in little towns and villages and churches and missionary forces and labor unions throughout the United States—it has been their profound belief that the control of China by a foreign power was contrary to American interests. The interesting part about that is it was not contrary to the interests of the people of China. There was not conflict but parallelism in that interest. And so from the time of the announcement of the open-door policy through the nine-power treaty to the very latest resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations, we have stated that principle and we believe it. And similarly in all the rest of Asia—in the Philippines, in India, in Pakistan, and Indonesia, and in Korea—for years and years and years the interests of Americans throughout this country have been in favor of their independence. This is where their independence societies and their patriotic groups have come for funds and sympathy. The whole policy of our Government insofar as we have responsibility in the Philippines was to bring about the accomplishment of this independence and our sympathy and help. The very real help which we have given other nations in Asia has been in that direction and it is still in that direction.

Now, I stress this, which you may think is a platitude, because of a very important fact: I hear almost everyday someone say that the real interest of the United States is to stop the spread of communism. Nothing seems to me to put the cart before the horse more completely than that. Of course we are interested in stopping the spread of communism. But we are interested for a far deeper reason than any conflict between the Soviet Union and the United States. We are interested in stopping the spread of communism because communism is a doctrine that we don't happen to like. Communism is the most subtle instrument of Soviet foreign policy that has ever been devised and it is really the spearhead of Russian imperialism which would, if it could, take from these people what they have won, what we want them to keep and develop which is their own national independence, their own individual independence, their own development of their own resources for their own good and not as mere tributary states to this great Soviet Union.

Now, it is fortunate that this point that I made does not represent any real conflict. It is an important point because people will do more damage and create more misrepresentation in the Far East by saying our interest is merely to stop the spread of communism than any other way. Our real interest is in those people as people. It is because communism is hostile to that interest that we want to stop it. But it happens that the best way of doing both things is to do just exactly what the peoples of Asia want to do and what we want to help them to do, which is to develop a soundness and administration of these new governments and to develop their resources and their technical skills so that they are not subject to penetration either through ignorance or because they believe these false promises, or because there is real distress in their areas. If we can help that development, if we can go forward with it, then we have brought about the best way that anyone knows of stopping this spread of communism.

It is important to take this attitude not as a mere negative reaction to communism but as the most positive affirmation of the most affirmative truth that we hold, which is in the dignity and right of every nation, of every people, and of every individual to develop in their own way, making their own mistakes, reaching their own triumphs, but acting under their own responsibility. That is what we are pressing for in the Far East and that is what we must affirm and not get mixed up with purely negative and inconsequential statements.

Now, let me come to another underlying and important factor which determines our relations and, in turn, our policy with the peoples of Asia. That is the attitude of the Soviet Union toward Asia and particularly toward those parts of Asia which are contiguous to the Soviet Union, and with great particularity this afternoon, to north China.

The attitude and interest of the Russians in north China, and in these other areas as well, long antedates communism. This is not something that has come out of communism at all. It long antedates it. But the Communist regime has added new methods, new skills, and new concepts to the thrust of Russian imperialism. These communistic concepts and techniques have armed Russian imperialism with a new and most insidious weapon of penetration. Armed with these new powers, what is happening in China is that the Soviet Union is detaching the northern provinces [areas] of China from China and is attaching them to the Soviet Union. This process is complete in Outer Mongolia. It is nearly complete in Manchuria and I am sure that in Inner Mongolia and in Sinkiang, there are very happy reports coming from Soviet agents to Moscow. This is what is going on. It is the detachment of these whole areas, vast areas—populated by Chinese—the detachment of these areas from China and their attachment to the Soviet Union.

I wish to state this and perhaps sin against my doctrine of nondogmatism, but I should like to suggest at any rate that this fact that the Soviet Union is taking the four northern provinces of China is the single most significant, most important fact, in the relation of any foreign power with Asia.

What does that mean for us? It means something very, very significant. It means that nothing that we do and nothing that we say must be allowed to obscure the reality of this fact. All the efforts of propaganda will not be able to obscure it. The only thing that can obscure it is the folly of ill-conceived adventures on our part which easily could do so and I urge all who are thinking about these foolish adventures to remember that we must not seize the unenviable position which the Russians have carved out for themselves. We must not undertake to deflect from the Russians to ourselves the righteous anger and the wrath and the hatred of the Chinese people which must develop. It would be folly to deflect it to curselves. We must take the position we have always taken that anyone who violates the integrity of China is the enemy of China and is acting contrary to our own interest. That, I suggest to you this afternoon, is the first and the greatest rule in regard to the formulation of American policy toward Asia.

I suggest that the second rule is very like the first. That is to keep our own purposes perfectly straight, perfectly pure and perfectly aboveboard and do not get them mixed up with legal quibbles or the attempt to do one thing and really achieve another.

The consequences of this Russian attitude and this Russian action in China are perfectly enormous. They are saddling all those in China who are proclaiming their loyalty to Moscow, and who are allowing themselves to be used as puppets of Moscow, with the most awful responsibility which they must pay for. Furthermore, these actions of the Russians are making plainer than any speech or any utterance or any legislation can make throughout all of Asia what the true purposes of the Soviet Union are and what the true function of communism as an agent of Russian imperialism is. These I suggest to you are the fundamental factors, fundamental realities of attitude out of which our relations and policies must grow.

Now, let's, in the light of that, consider some of these policies. First of all, let's deal with the question of military security. I deal with it first because it is important and because, having stated our policy in that regard, we must clearly understand that the military menace is not the most immediate.

What is the situation in regard to the military security of the Pacific area and what is our policy in regard to it?

In the first place, the defeat and the disarmament of Japan has placed upon the United States the necessity of assuming the military defense of Japan so long as that is required, both in the interest of our security and in the interests of the security of the entire Pacific area and in all honor in the interest of Japanese security. We have American and there are Australian troops in Japan. I am not in a position to speak for the Australians, but I can assure you that there is no intention of any sort of abandoning or weakening the defenses of Japan and that whatever arrangements are to be made, either through permanent settlement or otherwise, that defense must, and shall be, maintained.

This defensive perimeter runs along the Aleutians to Japan and then goes to the Ryukyus. We hold important defense positions in the Ryukyu Islands and those we will continue to hold. In the interest of the population of the Ryukyu Islands, we will at an appropriate time offer to hold these islands under trusteeship of the United Nations. But they are essential parts of the defensive perimeter of the Pacific and they must, and will be, held.

The defensive perimeter runs from the Ryukyus to the Philippine Islands. Our relations, our defensive relations with the Philippines, are contained in agreements between us. Those agreements are being loyally carried out and will be loyally carried out. Both peoples have learned by bitter experience the vital connections between our mutual defense requirements. We are in no doubt about that and it is hardly necessary for me to say an attack on the Philippines could not and would not be tolerated by the United States. But I hasten to add that no one perceives the imminence of any such attack.

So far as the military security of other areas in the Pacific is concerned, it must be clear that no person can guarantee these areas against military attack. But it must also be clear that such a guarantee is hardly sensible or necessary within the realm of practical relationship. Should such an attack occur—one hesitates to say where such an armed attack could come from—the initial reliance must be on the people attacked to resist it and then upon the commitments of the entire civilized world under the Charter of the United Nations which so far has not proved a weak reed to lean on by any people who are determined to protect their independence against outside aggression. But it is a mistake, I think, in considering Pacific and far-eastern problems to become obsessed with military considerations. Important as they are, there are other problems that press and these other problems are not capable of solution through military means. These other problems arise out of the susceptibility of many areas and many countries in the Pacific area to subversion and penetration. That cannot be stopped by military means.

The susceptibility to penetration arises because in many areas there are new governments which have little experience in governmental administration and have not become firmly established or perhaps firmly accepted in their countries. They grow in part from very serious economic problems, some of them growing out directly from the last war, others growing indirectly out of the last war because of the disruptions of trade with other parts of the world, with the disruption of arrangements which furnished credit and management to these areas for many years. That has resulted in dislocation of economic effort and in a good deal of suffering among the peoples concerned. In part this susceptibility to penetration comes from the great social upheaval about which I have been speaking, an upheaval which was carried on and confused a great deal by the Japanese occupation and by the propaganda which has gone on from Soviet sources since the war.

Here then are the problems in these other areas which require some policy on our part, and I should like to point out two facts to you and then discuss in more detail some of these areas.

The first fact is the great difference between our responsibility and our opportunities in the northern part of the Pacific area and in the southern part of the Pacific area. In the north, we have direct responsibility in Japan and we have direct opportunity to act. The same thing to a lesser degree is true in Korea. There we had direct responsibility and there we did act and there we have a greater opportunity to be effective than we have in the more southerly part.

In the southerly part of the area, we are one of many nations who can do no more than help. The direct responsibility lies with the peoples concerned. They are proud of their new national responsibility. You cannot sit around in Washington or London or Paris or The Hague and determine what the policies are going to be in those areas. You can be willing to help and you can help only when the conditions are right for help to be effective.

That leads me to the other thing that I wanted to point out and that is the limitation of effective American assistance. American assistance can be effective when it is the missing component in a situation which might otherwise be solved. The United States cannot furnish all these components to solve the question. It cannot furnish determination, it cannot furnish the will and it cannot furnish the loyalty of a people to its Government. But if the will and if the determination exists and if the people are behind their Government, then, and not always then, is there a very good chance. In that situation American help can be effective and it can lead to an accomplishment which could not otherwise be achieved.

Now, with that statement, let's deal very briefly—because the time is going on and I am almost equaling my performance in the Senate and House—let's deal very briefly with some of the problems. Let's take the situation in Japan for a moment. There there are three great factors to be faced. The security matter I have dealt with. Aside from that, there are the economic questions and the political questions. In the political field, General MacArthur has been very successful and the Japanese are hammering out with some effort and with some backsliding and regaining and backsliding again of progress a political system which is based on nonmilitaristic institutions.

In the economic field, we have not been so successful. That is in very large part due to the inherent difficulty of the problem. The problem arises with the necessity of Japan being able to buy raw materials and sell goods. The former connections of Japan with the mainland and with some of the islands have been disrupted. That has produced difficulties. The willingness of other countries to receive Japanese goods has very much contracted since the war.

Difficulties of currency have added to those problems. But those matters have got to be faced and have got to be solved. Whether they are solved under a treaty or if the procedural difficulties of that are too great under some other mechanism, they must be solved along lines which permit the Japanese greater freedom—complete freedom if possible—to buy what they need in the world and to sell what they have to offer on the mainland of Asia, in southeast Asia, and in other parts of the world. That is the nature of the problem and it is a very tough one. It is one on which the occupation authorities, the Japanese Government, ourselves, and others are working. There can be no magic solution to it.

In Korea, we have taken great steps which have ended our military occupation and in cooperation with the United Nations have established an independent and sovereign country recognized by nearly all the rest of the world. We have given that nation great help in getting itself established. We are asking the Congress to continue that help until it is firmly established, and that legislation is now pending before the Congress. The idea that we should scrap all of that, that we should stop halfway through the achievement of the establishment of this country, seems to me to be the most utter defeatism and utter madness in our interests in Asia. But there our responsibilities are more direct and our opportunities more clear. When you move to the south, you find that our opportunity is much slighter and that our responsibilities, except in the Philippines and there indirectly, are very small. Those problems are very confusing.

In the Philippines, we acted with vigor and speed to set up an independent sovereign nation which we have done. We have given the Philippines a billion dollars of direct economic aid since the war. We have spent another billion dollars in such matters as veterans' benefits and other payments in the Philippines. Much of that money has not been used as wisely as we wish it had been used, but here again, we come up against the matter of responsibility. It is the Philippine Government which is responsible. It is the Philippine Government which must make its own mistakes. What we can do is advise and urge and if help continues to be misused to stop giving the help. We cannot direct, we should not direct, we have not the slightest desire to direct. I believe that there are indications that the Philippines may be facing serious economic difficulties. With energtic, determined action, they can perhaps be avoided or certainly minimized. Whether that will be true or not, I can not say, but it does not rest within the power of the American Government to determine that. We are always ready to help and to advise. That is all we can and all we should do.

Elsewhere in southeast Asia, the limits of what we can do are to help where we are wanted. We are organizing the machinery through which we can make effective help possible. The western powers are all interested. We all know the techniques. We have all had experiences which can be useful to those governments which are newly starting out if they want it. It cannot be useful if they don't want it. We know techniques of administration. We know techniques of organizing school districts and road districts and taxation districts. We know agricultural and industrial techniques, all of which can be helpful, and those we are preparing to make available if they are wanted, where they are wanted and under circumstances where they have a fighting chance to be successful. We will not do these things for the mere purpose of being active. They will not be done for the mere purpose of running around and doing good, but for the purpose of moving in where we are wanted to a situation where we have the missing component which, if put into the rest of the picture, will spell success.

The situation in the different countries of southeast Asia is difficult. It is highly confused in Burma where five different factions have utterly disrupted the immediate government of the country. Progress is being made in Indo-china where the French, although moving slowly, are moving. There are noticeable signs of progress in transferring responsibility to a local administration and getting the adherence of the population to this local administration. We hope that the situation will be such that the French can make further progress and make it quickly but I know full well the difficulties which are faced by the Foreign Minister of France and my admiration and respect for him are so great that I would not want one word I say to add a feather to the burden that he carries.

In Malaya, the British have and are discharging their responsibility harmoniously with the people of Malaya and are making progress.

In Indonesia, a great success has been achieved within the last few weeks and over a period of months. The round-table conferences at The Hague in which great statesmanship and restraint were displayed, both on the Dutch and the Indonesian side, have resulted in this new government being formed. Relations of this government with the Dutch will be very good and the Dutch can furnish them great help and advice and we will be willing to stand by to give whatever help we can rightly and profitably give. That situation is one which is full of encouragement although it is full of difficulty also.

As one goes to the end of this semicircle and comes to India and Pakistan, we find really grave troubles facing the world and facing these two countries there, both with respect to Kashmir, and to the utter difficulties—economic difficulties growing out of the differences in devaluation, settlement of monetary plans back and forth, et cetera. We know that they have assured one another and they have assured the world that as stubborn as these difficulties may be and difficult as they may be of solution, they are not going to resort to war to solve them. We are glad to hear those assurances and the whole world is glad to hear it but we know also that the problems are in such a situation and in such an area that they are most inflammable, and we believe that in addition to these most desirable assurances there should be some accommodation of wills to bring about a result as soon as possible.

In India and in Pakistan we are willing to be of such help as we can be. Again, the responsibility is not ours. Again we can only be helpful friends. Again the responsibility lies with people who have won their freedom and who are very proud of it.

So after this survey, what we conclude, I believe, is that there is a new day which has dawned in Asia. It is a day in which the Asian peoples are on their own and know it and intend to continue on their own. It is a day in which the old relationships between east and west are gone, relationships which at their worst were exploitation and which at their best were paternalism. That relationship is over and the relationship of east and west must now be in the Far East one of mutual respect and mutual helpfulness. We are their friends. Others are their friends. We and those others are willing to help but we can help only where we are wanted and only where the conditions of help are really sensible and possible. So what we can see is that this new day in Asia, this new day which is dawning, may go on to a glorious noon or it may darken and it may drizzle out. But that decision lies within the countries of Asia and within the power of the Asian people. It is not a decision which a friend or even an enemy from the outside can decide for them.

Thank you very much.

Mr. O'Brien then read the following questions which were submitted in writing by the members of the Press Club:

1. Can you explain why the Republican leaders are so intent in intervening in the hopeless Chinese situation when they opposed the Truman plan for Europe?

2. Up to now, we have been emphasizing our problems in Europe. Does this mean that from now on our problems lie mainly in Asia?

3. You touched on the Korean situation. There are two rather definite queries here. One is whether it is militarily tenable to hold South Korea in the face of aggression from the North, and secondly, whether it is a suitable base for possible operations?

4. You stated that the present trend in Asia is to throw off foreign domination. Is not the present debacle in China the very reverse of this; that is, the allowance of a foreign power to overthrow an existing self-government?

5. The President has said that there will be no military aid for Formosa. Yet we see stories and pictures of shiploads of tanks and planes and aircraft being shipped from United States ports to Formosa. Who is providing these weapons to Formosa?

Secretary ACHESON. Mr. President, let me separate these questions into those I can deal with and those which I cannot deal with. One of the sound rules of ancient justice was that the wise thing for a court to do was to observe the limits of its jurisdiction. Having studied the Constitution and statutes of the United States applicable to the duties of the Secretary of State, particularly a Democratic Secretary of State, I find nothing in them which gives me either responsibility or power for the action of Republican leaders.

Similarly these questions which are directed toward military conceptions in regard to Korea seem to me to fall properly within the area of responsibility of the Department of Defense and I am sure that they will deal appropriately with those questions. Now, that leaves me some here which I should like to take up.

One is a question of fact which says: Who is paying for the materials which you see being shipped to Formosa? The materials which are being shipped to Formosa are being paid for by the Nationalist Government of China, and those payments have been paid either out of their own funds or out of the remaining part of the $125,000,000 which was appropriated by the Congress. Those goods are being shipped at the present time. They are being shipped under export licenses and there is no intention or desire to interfere with their shipment. I think this question was asked at my own press conference and was answered by me.

Now, here are two other questions which state that in the past we have been emphasizing problems in Europe. Does what I have said this afternoon mean that we are now emphasizing problems of Asia? And a question which says that what I have said indicates that the great desire in the Far East is to throw off foreign domination and is not the present debacle in China going to result in foreign domination?

Let's deal with this which I think I have dealt with. Let's clear it up in a few words.

One of our difficulties in the United States is that we tend to put on blinders and we can only look at one thing at a time. Therefore, since a speaker cannot cover all parts of the world in one afternoon in one speech, if he does cover one aspect, the conclusion appears to be drawn that he has abandoned all interest in other aspects of foreign policy. Of course, it is not our intention in any way to diminish the interest or the intensity of our interest in Europe. What I have been talking about are the problems of Asia today. I have tried to talk about what we have done in the past and what we intend to do so far as we can in the future. What I have said, I think indicates a continuity of effort and a continuity of principle.

We are hoping to get from the Congress broader and wider powers and more support to do what we have been doing more vigorously. The President has a fund of $75,000,000 which is available. We are asking the Congress under the point 4 program for authority and further funds and we are going ahead along the lines that we have gone ahead in the past but we hope with greater power and greater resources and greater funds.

Now, in regard to this conflict in China, of course, what has been asked is true and of course the fundamental interest in China is to get rid of foreign domination. Of course, one of the results of recent events is the reintroduction of a new and even more powerful foreign domination. That conflict, it seems to me, is one of the underlying facts upon which American policy must be based. I have been urging this afternoon that we do not put ourselves in a position of deflecting the attention of the Chinese people from this basic and real fact. We do not want to deflect their attention from what the Russians are doing to some silly adventure which some people in this country are urging.

May I say one other thing which is not in answer to a question but is something that I have long wanted to get off my chest and since you are helpless victims, you must listen to it. It seems to me that a great deal of the discussion of our foreign affairs loses in helpfulness because it is misdirected in aim. There seems to be a great interest in many quarters in trying to point out a logical inconsistency. They say if you do so and so in Greece, why don't you do so and so in China? The idea is that we must always act exactly the same way in every country in the world, and if you don't somebody rings up score one on the cash register. That, I think, is not a helpful way of discussing foreign policy and it is a very false trend.

The United States in my judgment acts in regard to a foreign nation strictly in regard to American interests or those wider interests which affect American interest. And if it is to American interests or those wider interests which affect it, to do one thing in one country and another thing in another country, then that is the consistency upon which I propose to advise the President, and I am not in the slightest bit worried at all because somebody can say, "Well, you said so and so about Greece, why isn't all of this true about China?" I will be polite. I will be patient and I will try to explain why Greece is not China, but my heart will not be in that battle.

Therefore, what I think we should all do is to look at the problem before us. Don't bounce it off another problem somewhere else, but hit it directly and say, "What is the common-sense thing from the point of view of American interest to do here?"

Once we can solve that, we can have little side humorous debates about how different it is from something else but we are on the main track there and we will pursue American interests which it is my duty to pursue and which it is the wish of all of us to pursue.

INTERNATIONALIZATION OF JERUSALEM—STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a statement which I have prepared on the subject of America's sound position in opposition to the United Nation's resolution dealing with the internationalization of the state of Jerusalem. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD, along with a resolution which I have received from my State, and certain other material.

There being no objection, the statement, resolution, and other material were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ENDORSEMENT OF UNITED STATES POSITION

I have in my hands the text of a press release reporting on the unanimous action by representatives of many leading organizations of our country, endorsing the vote which the United States cast in the General Assembly in opposition to the proposed internationalization of Jerusalem.

These organizations include Americans of many faiths, many backgrounds, many walks of life. I believe that they were sound in their commendation of our Government's action, because I definitely believe, as pointed out in the release and in the following resolution, that it is impractical, undesirable, and absurdly costly to even attempt to apply the United Nation's decision in the face of justified opposition by both the Arab and Jewish nations.

MILWAUKEE RESOLUTION OPPOSED UN STAND

Last November a mass meeting was held in the city of Milwaukee by the Milwaukee Zionist Emergency Council on this subject and I should like to have the text of the fine resolution which this meeting adopted also printed at this point in the RECORD.

The main interest of world public opinion is naturally that justice and equity be served in the holiest of cities—Jerusalem—sacred to the Christian, Moslem, and Jewish faiths. Ninety percent of the sacred shrines and holy places lie within the walls of the old city of Jerusalem, which is under the control of the Arabs. The Israeli Government has indicated its desire for complete UN observance over these holy shrines and has in turn readily granted freedom of access to all holy places within its jurisdiction.

This, however, is a far different matter from the undesirable proposal for internationalization of the entire city of Jerusalem, plus setting up a 60-square-mile enclave around the city. Obviously, the UN has no police force powerful enough to make such a scheme effective, and it is quite clear that such a conclave would involve far more new problems than it would actually solve.

NEW CITY MUST REMAIN IN ISRAEL

I should like to point out further, Mr. President, that the new city of Jerusalem, comprising the major portion of the whole city, is 95 percent Jewish in population and to attempt to separate the new city from the new state of Israel would be to violate the principles of historic justice, as well as to be in direct contradiction with America's recognition of that heroic new state.

UN DECISION MUST BE RESCINDED

I am hopeful, therefore, that in the interest of world Christianity, that in respect for the religious principles of Moslem civilization, that in respect to both the Arab and Jewish neighbor states, the United Nations will promptly recognize that its decision must be rescinded.

Such a change will help assure stability and peace in the troubled Near East and will help push back the clouds of conflict which hover over that embattled area.

PRESS RELEASE OF JANUARY 10, 1950

National representatives of church, labor, veterans, education, and other public-interest groups today presented to Under Secretary of State James E. Webb a memorandum addressed to the Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, approving the vote cast by the United States Government against the United Nations resolution dealing with the internationalization of Jerusalem.

The memorandum emphasized that the resolution was impractical and unenforceable. It pointed to the unduly heavy costs which the United Nations would be requested to absorb and toward which the United States Government would have to contribute the major portion of the necessary funds. The delegation also pointed out that the structure of the United Nations would be strained and weakened in the attempt to enforce internationalization.

The delegation urged the State Department to support a proposal for an international arrangement to secure the holy places and free access to them under a United Nations guaranty.

Among the representatives of national organizations who presented the memorandum to the State Department were the following: Rev. Donald B. Cloward, executive secretary, Council on Christian Social Progress, Northern Baptist Convention; Lilian K. Watford, Washington representative, United Council of Church Women; Dr. Joseph B. Dawson, executive director, Commission on Public Affairs, Baptists of the United States; Michael Ross, director, Department for International Affairs, Congress of Industrial Organizations; Victor E. Devereaux, national commander, Regular Veterans Association; Leslie Perry, national representative, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; James Loeb, Jr., national executive secretary, Americans for Democratic Action; L. C. Pakiser, executive director, American Veterans Committee; Elizebeth Christman, Washington representative, National Women's Trade-Union League; Russell Smith, legislative secretary, National Farmers Union; Jacob Blaustein, president, American Jewish Committee; Elmer W. Henderson, director, American Council on Human Rights; Bernard Weitzer, legislative representative, Jewish War Veterans of the United States; Dr. Richard B. Kennan, executive secretary, Commission for the Defense of Democracy Through Education, National Education Association; Philip Schiff, Washington representative, National Jewish Welfare Board.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 10, 1950.

The Honorable DEAN ACHESON,
Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The undersigned, who have supported the aims and principles of the United Nations since its inception and have made every effort to strengthen it, have noted and approved the vote cast by our Government against the resolution dealing with the internationalization of Jerusalem passed by the General Assembly of the United Nations in the session just concluded.

We therefore deplore the action taken by the General Assembly of the United Nations for the following reasons:

1. The action of the United Nations imperils the peace negotiations now proceeding between Hashemite Jordan and Israel as a logical sequence of their armistice, and which would probably conclude in an equitable settlement of the Jerusalem problem and the protection of the holy places.

2. The United Nations, as the result of its resolution, has put itself in a position of vitiating the great efforts it has made since its inception to assure peace among nations by attempting to superimpose upon the two sovereign nations whose territorial interests are most closely related to Jerusalem a resolution which it is impractical if not impossible to enforce.

3. By adoption of the resolution the United Nations has embarked upon a course which calls for an initial expenditure of $8,500,000, nearly one-fourth of its total budget. This puts an almost unsupportable burden upon the fiscal operations of the United Nations. But even worse, the full cost of attempted enforcement is unpredictable.

4. We, therefore, call upon our Government to use every means within its power to correct the action taken by the General Assembly of the United Nations and thereby restore the full capacity of the United Nations to assure peace among nations, in favor of the solution which we believe can be reached by Hashemite Jordan and Israel through their continued negotiations for a treaty of peace between them which will insure complete protection of the holy places under United Nations jurisdiction.

Sincerely yours,

Rev. Donald B. Cloward, Executive Secretary, Council on Christian Social Progress, Northern Baptist Convention; Lilian K. Watford, Washington Representative, United Council of Church Women; Dr. Joseph B. Dawson, Executive Director, Commission on Public Affairs, Baptists of the United States; Michael Ross, Director, Department for International Affairs, Congress of Industrial Organizations; Victor E. Devereaux, National Commander, Regular Veterans Association; Leslie Perry, National Representative, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Jacob Blaustein, President, American Jewish Committee; Philip Schiff, Washington Representative, National Jewish Welfare Board; James Loeb, Jr., National Executive Secretary, Americans for Democratic Action; L. C. Pakiser, Executive Director, American Veterans Committee; Elizabeth Christman, Washington Representative, National Women's Trade Union League; Russell Smith, Legislative Secretary, National Farmers Union; Elmer W. Henderson, Director, American Council on Human Rights; Bernard Weitzer, Legislative Representative, Jewish War Veterans of the United States; Dr. Richard B. Kennan, Executive Secretary, Commission for the Defense of Democracy Through Education, National Education Association.

RESOLUTION OF MILWAUKEE ZIONIST EMERGENCY COUNCIL

Whereas, as American Jews, we are grateful to the President and the Government of the United States for the leading role they have played in the effectuation of Palestine's partition and in the subsequent admission of Israel to the United Nations Organization; and

Whereas the United Nations Conciliation Commission's proposal to sever Jerusalem from Israel, a plan which would place all of the Holy City within a 60-square-mile enclave under the permanent authority of an international regime, would threaten the security of Israel; and

Whereas the siege of Jerusalem was lifted, not by a United Nations truce but by the military strength of the Jewish residents of Israel who, though sorely pressed for its own survival, summoned all its resources to relieve stricken Jerusalem and saved it from strangulation; and

Whereas the city of Jerusalem is predominantly Jewish in population, comprising over 90 percent of its total inhabitants, in art, culture, educational and medical institutions, commerce, trade, and industry; and

Whereas for 3,000 years the Jewish people have looked upon Jerusalem with special reverence, regarding it as the spiritual center of the Jewish religion: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, American Jews of the city of Milwaukee, meeting in joint assembly this 2d day of November 1949, do hereby call upon the Government of the United States to repudiate the impractical and unjust plan of the United Nations Palestine Conciliation Commission which would cut off Jerusalem from Israel; and be it further

Resolved, That while we are mindful of the international character of the Christian shrines and holy places in Jerusalem, we respectfully submit that only these sites—and no more—be placed under the supervision of the United Nations; and be it finally

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to President Harry S. Truman and be brought to the personal attention of Congressmen ANDREW BIEMILLER and CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI, and United States Senators ALEXANDER WILEY and JOSEPH MCCARTHY.

Rabbi LOUIS SWICHKOW,
Chairman.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

On his own request and by unanimous consent, Mr. SMITH of New Jersey was excused from attendance on the session of the Senate on Monday next, so that he may keep an important engagement in New Jersey.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR MARTIN AT CAMPAIGN DINNER OF REPUBLICAN CITY COMMITTEE OF PHILADELPHIA

ADDRESS BY SENATOR MARTIN AT DEDICATION OF THE MELLON DORMITORY, WASHINGTON AND JEFFERSON COLLEGE

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further routine matters to be presented, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], who is entitled to the floor, may proceed.

DELIVERED PRICE SYSTEMS AND FREIGHT-ABSORPTION PRACTICES—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1008) to define the application of the Federal Trade Commission Act and the Clayton Act to certain pricing practices.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, the conferees appointed to represent the Senate on the committee of conference on the disagreeing amendments of the two Houses on S. 1008 entered the motion to agree to the conference report, believing that its provisions represented sound legislation for the benefit of the general public.

Following the extended debate just prior to adjournment of the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, the Senate postponed consideration of the report until this date. Since the adjournment continued consideration has been given by those of us who have advocated passage of this measure.

The proposed legislation is intended to clear up widespread confusion which has been prevalent as to whether or not it is legal to absorb freight and to quote delivered prices when an individual acts independently and in good faith and where there is no conspiracy or collusive effort.

Since the conference report on S. 1008 was filed in the Senate there has been a concerted attack on the bill, a great deal of the barrage being aimed at section 4D. As pointed out in the statements of the managers on the part of the Senate, the Senate amendment to this section defined the term "the effect may be" to mean that there is "substantial and probative evidence" of the specified effect. The amendment to this section adopted by the House would define the term to mean that there is "reasonable probability" of the specified effect. The compromise language adopted by the conferees to this section sought to define the term to mean that there is "reliable, probative, and substantial evidence" of the specified effect. This was simply adopting the exact language of the Administrative Procedure Act.

In view of the vigorous and highly vocal opposition to this compromise language, and in an effort to avoid any suggestion of a desire to weaken either the Robinson-Patman Act or the Clayton Act, the Senate managers, at the suggestion of the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], sought the advice of the Department of Justice on the matter. It might be added that no one has been more determined to avoid any injurious change to the antitrust laws than has the senior Senator from Wyoming, who has also been outstanding in the effort to assist the legitimate aims of business and industry in regard to freight absorption and delivered prices.

At a meeting with the Attorney General of the United States, the head of the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice, and the Assistant to the Attorney General, there were present various Members of the Senate who have been in support of this proposed legislation. This group included the able senior Senator from Nevada, chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. MCCARRAN], the able senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which previously had handled this legislation, and the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS]. It was the senior Senator from Pennsylvania who had originally introduced this proposal, which was then in the form of a moratorium for the suspension of action against the business interests involved during a period of study of this complicated subject matter.

As the outcome of the conference, the Attorney General was asked to submit a formal opinion analyzing each section of the conference report and giving his views as to whether any different language should be adopted in order to avoid conflict with the protective features of the antitrust statutes. The further request was made that the Attorney General suggest the precise language which should be used. Complying with the suggestion, the Justice Department subsequently delivered the opinion on the disputed points.

In the opinion on the meaning and interpretation of section 4D, contained in a letter over the signature of Mr. Peyton Ford, the Assistant to the Attorney General, dated January 13, the Justice Department, after stating categorically that it had no objection to the enactment of sections 1, 2, and 3 in their present form, did question the definition of the term "the effect may be." He suggested the possibility that the language of this definition, as approved by the conference committee, might be so construed that, to quote from Mr. Ford's letter, it "would impose an evidentiary burden that may go beyond the present requirements of the Clayton and Robinson-Patman Acts and create an almost impossible burden of proof by requiring positive evidence of facts not yet in existence."

The definition might also, Mr. Ford wrote, be interpreted as applying to other provisions of the Clayton Act in addition to those in the bill under discussion.

Speaking for the Justice Department, Mr. Ford recommended that, to avoid any possibility of such a construction, section 4D of the bill be amended to read as follows:

> D. The term "the effect may be" shall mean that there is reasonable probability of the specified effect.

It will be noted this was the language of the bill as passed by the House.

The conference committee was never at any time interested in any attempt to emasculate or in any way weaken the Robinson-Patman Act, or otherwise to withdraw from small business any of the protection now afforded by the present antitrust laws.

As viewed by the conference, there was no foundation for the fears that had been expressed that any of the definitions contained in section 4 might be construed as carrying over into the Clayton Act, as amended, and as applying to, or affecting, the construction of the defined terms as used elsewhere in that act.

In their statement, the conference committee pointed out that such fears were ungrounded, since the definitions in section 4 were, by the terms of the section, applicable to the defined terms only "as used in this act." Therefore, the Senate managers were firmly of the opinion that the same or similar terms, as they may appear in any portion of the Clayton Act not specifically rewritten by Senate bill 1008, necessarily would remain unaffected.

At this time I should like to place in the RECORD a statement, with which all the managers on the part of the Senate concur, respecting the meaning and interest of section 4D. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEANING AND INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 4D OF S. 1008

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1008) to define the application of the Federal Trade Commission Act and the Clayton Act to certain pricing practices, desires to submit a supplement to the conference report which supplement it feels is necessary in order to make clear to the Members of the respective Houses the scope, effect, and meaning of section 4D of the bill as reported out by the conference.

When the report of the conference was before each of the Houses last October great concern was expressed as to the effect of this section upon the Clayton Act in two respects: (1) That it may have the effect of changing existing law by imposing upon the Federal Trade Commission a greater burden of proof, in establishing a violation of the act, than is required under present law, and (2) that, to the extent that this is so, it will have that effect, not only upon the specific provisions embraced within this bill, but upon other provisions of the Clayton Act as well.

This situation, the committee feels, results wholly from a misunderstanding of the meaning of the words now in section 4D of the bill and a misconception of their application to the existing law. The committee therefore takes this opportunity to record the congressional intent with respect to what was intended by this section of the bill and in so doing to explain to the Congress the meaning to be given the section The committee is satisfied that a reference to the legislative history of this bill, for reasons hereinafter stated, can lead only to the conclusion that section 4D does not, and is not intended to, change existing law in any respect and that even if it were to change it, such changes would extend only to the specific provisions of this bill wherein the defined term is used, and would not extend to other provisions of the Clayton Act.

It has been contended by some, however, that the clear language of section 4D will foreclose the courts from looking to the legislative history. Our answer to that contention is twofold. First, the plain language of the provision, even without resort to legislative history, is susceptible to no other interpretation than that which we have hereinbefore given it. Secondly, it is clear under the controlling Supreme Court decisions, that the courts would not be foreclosed from looking to the legislative history in interpreting this provision.

The prevailing attitude of the Supreme Court, as expressed in two recent cases, United States v. American Trucking Associations (310 U. S. 534 (1940)) and Northern Trust Co. v. Harrison (317 U. S. 476 (1943)) is that in interpretation of statutes, courts should construe the language so as to give effect to the intent of Congress and in ascertaining that intent they may properly look to the legislative history of the statute.

In the former case, speaking through Mr. Justice Reed, the Court said (pp. 542–544):

"In the interpretation of statutes, the function of the courts is easily stated. It is to construe the language so as to give effect to the intent of Congress. There is no invariable rule for the discovery of that intention. To take a few words from their context and with them thus isolated to attempt to determine their meaning, certainly would not contribute greatly to the discovery of the purpose of the draftsman of a statute, particularly in a law drawn to meet many needs of a major occupation.

"There is, of course, no more persuasive evidence of the purpose of a statute than the words by which the legislature undertook to give expression to its wishes. Often these words are sufficient in and of themselves to determine the purpose of the legislation. In such cases we have followed their plain meaning. When that meaning has led to absurd or futile results, however, this court has looked beyond the words to the purpose of the act. Frequently, however, even when the plain meaning did not produce absurd results but merely an unreasonable one 'plainly at variance with the policy of the legislation as a whole' this court has followed the purpose, rather than the literal words. When aid to the construction of the meaning of words, as used in the statute, is available, there certainly can be no rule of law which forbids its use, however clear the words may appear on superficial examination."

The Northern Trust case is even more emphatic in its language. In that case the use of legislative history in the construction of a statute clear on its face, was the only issue in the case. The Circuit Court of Appeals had refused to examine the legislative history of an act of Congress on the ground that the language of the statute was clear and unambiguous. In its reversal in a unanimous opinion the court said:

"Words are inexact tools at best and for that reason there is wisely no rule of law forbidding resort to explanatory legislative history no matter how clear the words may appear on superficial examination."

In Mitchell v. Cohen (333 U. S. 411 (1948)), despite an allegation of clear and obvious meaning (p. 417), the Court resorted to legislative history to determine congressional intent.

During the past 10 years the Supreme Court has decided more than 130 cases in which legislative history was decisive of construction of a particular statutory provision. For a listing of such cases see 335 U. S. 687–689.

For the benefit of the courts, if the need for construction of this section should arise, the committee desires to state unequivocally its intentions with respect to the language it recommends in section 4D, so that there can be no lingering doubt as to the meaning of that section.

The definition of "effect may be" does not change the Clayton Act as it is presently construed. This term appears in Section 2A and section 3 of S. 1008.

Section 2A amends section 2 (a) of the Clayton Act. As used in section 2A of S. 1008 the term "the effect may be" reads as follows:

"If differences between such prices are not such that their effect upon competition may be that prohibited by this section."

The "specified effect" referred to in section 4D is that effect which is prohibited by this section. But the "effect prohibited by this section" is that which is prohibited by section 2 (a) of the Clayton Act, namely, a price discrimination where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition. The term as used in section 2A of the bill means, therefore, that there must be a showing through reliable, probative, and substantial evidence that the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition.

Section 3 of S. 1008 amends section 2 (b) of the Clayton Act. As used in section 3 of S. 1008, the term "the effect may be" reads thusly:

"Upon proof being made, at any hearing on a complaint under this section, that there has been discrimination in price the effect of which upon competition may be that prohibited by the preceding subsection."

Here again, the specified effect is that effect which is prohibited by section 2 (a) of the Clayton Act. The meaning of the term "the effect may be" as used in section 3 of S. 1008 is, therefore, identical to its meaning in section 2A of the bill, namely, that there must be reliable, probative, and substantial evidence that the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition. That of which there must be reliable, probative, and substantial evidence is not that competition has actually lessened, but only that it may be lessened.

Reliable, probative, and substantial evidence that the effect of a price difference may be to lessen competition is, however, required under existing law. Thus, the effect of section 4D is to leave the present status of the law unchanged, except as it restores the rule that existed prior to the 1948 decision in Federal Trade Commission v. Morton Salt Co. (334 U. S. 37), namely, that there must be a reasonable probability of lessened competition and not mere reasonable possibility as was held in that case.

Prior to the adoption of the Administrative Procedure Act of 1945 the courts, following the rule laid down in Standard Fashion Co. v. Magrane-Houston (258 U. S. 346 (1922)), consistently held that the evidentiary requirement respecting the effect on competition under section 2 (a) of the Clayton Act necessitated a showing of reasonable probability of the specified effect. The Morton Salt case has been the only departure from that rule. That case, although decided after the Administrative Procedure Act was passed, was not governed by the latter and appears to us inconsistent with its purpose and objective. Consequently, it has been the purpose in S. 1008 to restore the previous test.

The Administrative Procedure Act was passed in 1946 and is applicable to cases coming before the Federal Trade Commission. Section 7C of that act provides for every agency that—

"No sanction shall be imposed or rule or order be issued except upon consideration of the whole record or such portions thereof as may be cited by any party and as supported by and in accordance with reliable, probative, and substantial evidence."

The congressional debates disclose, and the Court has so held, that the purpose of the above provision is to improve the quality of evidence presented before agency proceedings. Although evidentiary requirements before administrative agencies are not and cannot be as strict as in civil or criminal proceedings, the intention of the Administrative Procedure Act was to do away with the scintilla rule. Securities & Exchange Commission v. Chenery Corp. (332 U. S. 194 (1947)); Willapoint Oysters v. Ewing (174 F. 2d 676, 1949), United States ex rel Lindenau v. Watkins (73 F. Supp. 216 (D. C. N. Y. 1947), reversed on other grounds, 164 F. 2d 457).

The consistent intention expressed in both the House of Representatives and the Senate, in formulating the provisions of S. 1008, has been to retain the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act and not to provide an exemption from them. The Senator from Wyoming (Mr. O'MAHONEY) recognized this fact when, in answer to an objection raised by the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. KEFAUVER) to a proposed amendment which would reword section 4D, he said:

"The language of the Administrative Procedure Act, which, of course, is now the law, is, as I understand, 'substantial and probative evidence.' So I think the objection of the Senator from Tennessee would be met by altering the amendment on page 4, line 6, to read as follows:

" 'Is substantial and probative evidence of the specified effect.'

"That would be a declaration of existing law" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Volume 95, Part VI, p. 7070).

The Senator from Tennessee accepted this suggestion (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Volume 95, Part VI, p. 7071) and the Senate passed S. 1008 with the understanding that section 4D did no more than restate existing law.

To summarize, the committee adopted this identical language, adding only the word "reliable" to conform to the exact wording of the Administrative Procedure Act. Section 4D, therefore, as applied to section 2 (a) of the Clayton Act, results in no change in existing law, since the present law requires reliable, probative, and substantial evidence that the effect of a price discrimination may be to lessen competition. This is the construction intended by the committee of conference when it filed its report. It is the construction intended by the sponsor of the bill. It is the construction intended by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] when he accepted the Senator from Wyoming's [Mr. O'MAHONEY] alternative. It is the construction intended by the Senate when it passed the bill. It is the present law applicable to all Clayton Act proceedings before the Federal Trade Commission.

Turning to the effect of section 4D upon other provisions of the Clayton Act, it is, of course, immaterial in view of the interpretation we put upon it, whether or not the section is applicable to sections other than those in S. 1008 which use the phrase "the effect may be." In order to dispel any doubts on this score, however, we wish to reiterate that section 4D applies only to the latter.

Section 4 defines the word "price" (4A), the terms "delivered price" (4B), "absorb freight" (4C), and "the effect may be" (4D) "as used in this act." Quite aside from its obvious limited meaning, the term "this act," being in the singular, clearly must refer to S. 1008 and not to the Clayton or Federal Trade Commission Acts generally, both of which S. 1008 would amend.

Section 4D defines the term "the effect may be" to mean "that there is reliable, probative, and substantial evidence of the specified effect." Since the term "the effect may be" is found only in section 2A and section 3 of "this act" (S. 1008), it is only to those sections of this act (S. 1008) to which it applies. Hence, it can have no application to the unamended portions of section 2 (a) of the Clayton Act or any other sections thereof.

In the light of this supplemental statement on the intended construction of section 4D, members of the committee of conference are satisfied that no possible construction, other than that heretofore expressed, can be given to section 4D by any court before which the question may be raised, and the Senate may vote upon S. 1008 with full confidence that statements herein represent the intended meaning of this section and that it will be so interpreted in the event that the bill becomes law.

PAT MCCARRAN.
HERBERT R. O'CONOR.
ALEXANDER WILEY.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, while still firmly of the belief that the compromise definition, in section 4D, of the clause "the effect may be," did not in any way weaken the safeguards already established in law to protect all business, and particularly small business, nevertheless, in view of the position taken by the Justice Department, we are perfectly satisfied to see this point reopened.

We would be willing, therefore, Mr. President, to see the conference report rejected, and to seek a new conference with a view to amending section 4D along the lines of the Justice Department's recommendation.

Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. LONG, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield; and, if so to whom?

Mr. O'CONOR. I am glad to yield. I yield first to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, as the Senator from Maryland very well knows, I supported the bill the Senate passed. I have had some private conversations with the Senator from Maryland, and he knows my interest in having enacted necessary and constructive legislation on this point. Personally, I agree with the viewpoint taken by the conferees that the conference report did not do violence to the Robinson-Patman Act, and that no one was going to be permitted to do anything in violence of that restraint on unfair competition, as had been done until the Supreme Court decision was rendered.

The only purpose of this measure was to restore what had been accepted as a normal and necessary means of doing business, without any intention at all of weakening the antitrust laws or of vitiating any part of the Robinson-Patman Act.

Personally, I would have no objection to voting today for the adoption of the conference report. But what disturbs me is this: If we agree to the suggestion—and I hesitate to oppose it, since I understand that all the conferees are going to unite on this matter—to let this measure go back to conference, will we have the Senator's assurance that in due season this measure will be brought before the Senate again?

Mr. O'CONOR. I can assure the Senator from Virginia that it is our hope and expectation that immediate consideration will be given the matter. We are just as anxious to move expeditiously to clear up the confused condition which we believe exists, as is anyone else, but at the same time we do not wish to do anything which by any possible construction might weaken or might be considered as possibly weakening the antitrust laws.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The distinguished Senator from Maryland knows that all of us have been flooded with letters, and he well knows that the patron of the Patman-Robinson Act has taken a very determined stand, as I understand, against any legislation on this subject at all, or else he wants the provisions which are written into the bill to be such as will fail to achieve the objective the Senator from Maryland and the junior Senator from Virginia have in mind.

Has the Senator from Maryland looked into the parliamentary procedures, practices, and regulations to the extent of being able to tell the Senate whether it would be possible for the House conferees to tie up this matter in conference, so that the Senate could not get the measure back before it again?

Mr. O'CONOR. Of course, there is no assurance which can be given by anyone in regard to what the conferees will or will not do. But I feel safe in saying to my friend, the junior Senator from Virginia, that we feel the managers on the part of the House are ready and willing to give immediate attention to the matter, and I would hope it can be brought to a successful conclusion.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I understand that the Senate conferees now are in agreement that the change suggested by the Department of Justice in the language merely does what we considered we already were doing in the language previously used.

Mr. O'CONOR. I may say, in answer to the Senator, that I hold in my hand a statement which I have asked to have incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. The statement is signed by the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], chairman of the committee, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], and the junior Senator from Maryland, who are the Senate conferees, unanimously agreeing to this language.

Mr. ROBERTSON. And I understand that we have the assurance of the chairman of the managers on the part of the Senate that it will be their very definite purpose, as soon as a satisfactory report can be agreed upon, to bring it back to us, and that we are not in effect permitting this important measure to be put to sleep indefinitely.

Mr. O'CONOR. I agree entirely with all that has been said by the Senator from Virginia, and hope to proceed to bring that situation about.

Mr. LONG, Mr. TOBEY, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. O'CONOR. I yield now to the Senator from Louisiana, who previously has sought recognition.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland is well aware, as chairman of the subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee having charge of this bill, that much of the controversy which has been raised over the bill came over the differences between amendments offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] on the floor of the Senate and by Representative CARROLL on the floor of the House. Those amendments were, in effect, designed to protect small business.

In view of the fact that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] is now a member of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, I wonder whether the Senator from Maryland would be willing, in the event that further conferences are had, to let the Senator from Tennessee be a member of the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. O'CONOR. In answer to the Senator from Louisiana, I would say that, of course, I have no control over the appointment of the conferees. But, knowing that the junior Senator from Tennessee has made a very sincere contribution to this entire matter, as have also the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] and the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], I can say that, if the present conferees happen to be members of the conference committee appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, we shall welcome from the Senators mentioned, and from any other Members of the Senate, any suggestions they may care to submit at the time the conference committee meets, and will give every consideration to any point of view they express. There will be nothing binding on the conference in any respect; the conferees will give full consideration to all questions, and will welcome and give attention to any suggestions the junior Senator from Tennessee and from the other Senators whom I have mentioned, including the junior Senator from Louisiana, may have to offer.

Mr. LONG. I wonder, in view of the differences between the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee and the amendment offered in the House, which was intended to accomplish the same effect, if the Senator would have any objection to the Senator from Tennessee being a member of the conference itself, to work out the differences between the two bills.

Mr. O'CONOR. I should have no objection whatever, although, of course, I should assume the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the senior Senator from Nevada, would, of course, be the first to be consulted on the question. But I should interpose no objection whatever.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina and Mr. THYE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield; and, if so to whom?

Mr. O'CONOR. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland whether, after having conferred with the other conferees on the part of the House, it is his opinion that they are in accord on referring the bill back to the committee?

Mr. O'CONOR. I may say to the Senator from South Carolina I believe that would render impossible, certainly most difficult, the consideration of the matter at this session, as the junior Senator from Virginia has indicated there is very good reason to do. The measure has received very extensive consideration by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, was reported by the committee, was debated on the floor of the Senate last June, was acted upon favorably, was sent to the House, was acted upon by the House, came back to the Senate, was discussed very much at length on the floor of the Senate, and then went to conference. When the conference committee report was submitted, it was then debated extensively. Personally, I see no valid reason for having the bill referred back to the Judiciary Committee at this time, but think the better purpose would be served by sending it to a conference between representatives of the Senate and House.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Has the Senator conferred with the conferees on the part of the House?

Mr. O'CONOR. I have not, I may say to the Senator from South Carolina, because at the present time there are no conferees on the part of the House; that is to say, the conference committee has reported to the House, the House has adopted the report, and the conferees have been discharged.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. O'CONOR. I yield.

Mr. THYE. I should like to make an inquiry of the junior Senator from Maryland. I am keenly interested in the basing-point legislation, as I believe all other Members of the Senate are. Nothing has brought so much confusion to businessmen as has the basing-point question. Since the convening of the present session, I have received a large number of telegrams and letters, both from druggists within my State and from the National Druggists Association, as well as from those engaged in the grocery business, setting forth their fears that the bill as drawn would destroy them eventually because of the unfair business practices. I do not share that feeling, however, and I do not believe the fears are justified or reasonably founded. In my opinion, there are ample safeguards in the bill, as was so ably set forth by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and other Senators in the debate which took place last fall. If the bill must be returned to the conference committee, I sincerely hope we may have the assurance of all who are serving on the conference committee as conferees on the part of the Senate, that they will speedily submit another report in order that the confusion which exists may be eliminated.

Those in my State who are engaged in the business of canning vegetables and corn are in a depressed state of affairs. Their businesses are suffering seriously. The same is true of the lumber industry, the cement business, the operators of lumber yards and coal yards, and all other businesses involving heavy freight shipments. They are in a state of confusion. I am positive that, unless we correct the situation, and correct it speedily, a great injury will be done to the entire free-enterprise system of the United States.

In closing, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Maryland whether he sees any danger in this type of legislation, so far as the druggists throughout the country are concerned?

Mr. O'CONOR. My answer is that I do not see any such danger, and have never seen danger in the bill as it is now drawn. To the contrary, I think it will promote the legitimate aims of business and will be for the best interests of all business, both large and small. However, I think there has resulted some misunderstanding on the part of the public, to which the junior Senator from Minnesota has adverted. We, too, have heard a great deal of that. It was in order to clear it up, to remove any possible doubt, that we sought the advice of the Attorney General. The best answer I can give the Senator, in saying we do not think the bill will be violative of the antitrust laws, is that the Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division himself suggests the language which we are ready to adopt.

Mr. THYE. The suggested language, while in no sense changing the basing-point question, will attempt to make certain there will be no misinterpretation of what has been sought in the bill as it is now written; is that correct?

Mr. O'CONOR. That is exactly so.

Mr. THYE. It is primarily designed to guard against misinterpretation of the language of the proposed act; is it not?

Mr. O'CONOR. That is exactly correct.

Mr. THYE. And at the same time it is designed primarily to carry out the purposes of the bill as now drawn; is it not?

Mr. O'CONOR. The Senator states the situation accurately.

Mr. THYE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. O'CONOR. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to congratulate the Senator from Maryland on his splendid explanation of the bill. I share his views. We should reject the conference report in order that we may then ask for the appointment of conferees to reconsider the matter and to correct the language in section 4D, as pointed out by the Senator. I wish to join with him in the statement he has made. I share his views, and I certainly hope the Senate will follow the suggestions offered by the Senator from Maryland and that the conference report will be rejected, in order that we may have a further conference. In that way I think we may obtain legislation. If any other course is pursued, it is very doubtful whether any such legislation will ever be enacted by the Congress.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. O'CONOR. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland a question. I know it is a most difficult question to answer, and I should like to preface it with a brief statement. Many of the small industries in Pennsylvania, which are now in great confusion by reason of the uncertainty of the decision in the basing-point case, are vitally interested, so far as the economy of the country is concerned. That is not equally true in the case of large corporations. The United States Steel Corp. has already taken the precaution of buying 3,000 acres of land in the eastern part of Pennsylvania for its seaboard use.

The large corporations can do that, the small ones cannot. Does the Senator feel that within a reasonable length of time a report can be brought back to the Senate, receive consideration, and be acted upon, so existing uncertainty may be cleared up?

Mr. O'CONOR. I am quite confident, I may say to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania, that that may be done. I think it will expedite the final consideration of the measure, and I think it will clarify the situation generally and will go far to give protection to the very interests for which the Senator is concerned. I know the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] has stressed the very points to which the Senator from Pennsylvania now refers. It is in order to rectify that situation, to remove any doubt, and to clear up the situation that the present suggestion is being made.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I greatly appreciate the Senator's statement. Things have already gone so far that there is unemployment in many of the smaller industries. I know of an industry in the neighboring State of West Virginia which has fallen off 60 percent by reason of the uncertainty. I appreciate very much the Senator's assurance.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. O'CONOR. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I desire at this time to congratulate the junior Senator from Maryland upon the splendid statement he has made, and for his attitude. From the beginning the Senator from Maryland has acted in good faith and with intelligence and good judgment, in trying to clarify a very serious situation in our economy. I think he is now showing excellent judgment in asking to have the bill returned to the House, in order that it may be perfected, so far as it is possible to perfect it, after seeking advice from the Attorney General and receiving his recommendation. I think the Senator is not only showing good judgment, but is acting in good faith, instead of trying to ram the conference report through the Senate, though I believe we have the votes in the Senate today to adopt the report without any change. Instead of that, the Senator is interested in having the best bill possible, and with that in his mind, and I believe that is what he has in his mind, he proposes to return it to the House, in an effort to have it perfected. I congratulate him for his attitude and for the constructive manner in which he has proceeded all through the tedious hearings and the lengthy legislative processes through which we have gone in trying to enact legislation.

Mr. O'CONOR. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I will not object to this bill's being returned to conference. However, I should like to point out one or two objectionable features which I fear are presently in the bill and which may be in the bill when it comes from conference. I think they should be considered by the conferees.

In the first place, when this bill was first considered by the Senate, many of us felt that it would not protect the small-business people of the Nation from being run out of business by unfair price discrimination. We felt, since the bill provided for absorbing prices to meet the prices of a competitor, in good faith, that it might permit discrimination of the kind which resulted in a case presently before the United States Supreme Court, a case in which Mr. Justice Minton wrote the opinion. The Senate thought enough of him to confirm his nomination as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Standard Oil Co. of Indiana was selling to certain customers at prices substantially lower than those at which it was selling to other filling-station operators. A few persons were receiving favoritism. The discrimination in price was so great that certain favored jobbers owning their own stations could sell gasoline at 1, 2, or 3 cents below the price which other filling-station operators could charge and remain in competition. That is the sort of situation against which the Robinson-Patman Act was designed to guard.

In the city of Detroit it so happened that jobbers could have bought an off-brand of gasoline at approximately the same price at which they could buy Standard Oil Co. gasoline if Standard Oil would discriminate.

Mr. President, I am not in favor of high prices. I am in favor of low prices at any time. But it is not fair to permit any large concern to sell at low prices to certain customers, usually to chain-store customers, and sell at high prices to small independent retailers.

The question is, If the discrimination in favor of a large concern is made in good faith, should that be a defense, under the Robinson-Patman Act, against the charge of unfair price discrimination? My argument is that it makes no difference whether someone is acting in good faith, if he is following a practice which will drive hundreds or thousands of persons out of business.

That is the reason, Mr. President, why every independent business organization, so far as I know, and every association of retail merchants, are against the bill as it is presently written. In my opinion, they would have been reasonably protected if the language offered by Representative CARROLL, of the House, had been agreed to by the Senate. I made an effort on the Senate floor, when the bill came back the first time, to get the Senate to agree to the House amendment, because I felt that we would not improve on the bill with the House amendment. I felt that we would protect retail merchants if we should insert the language which the House inserted in sections 2 and 3.

In my opinion, if that language is eliminated, independent merchants will be at the mercy of manufacturers and large chain stores.

The hearings on the Robinson-Patman bill led the committee to report that it had found in some instances that independent merchants were having to pay 30 percent more than the chain stores were paying. What difference would good faith make if there were discriminations in favor of large concerns, if the effect should be to run out of business hundreds and thousands of independent business people? We feel that the language inserted in section 2 and section 3 on the House side should be saved.

The Senate agreed to an amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER]. We inserted the words "except where the effect of such absorption of freight will be to substantially lessen competition."

That language was intended to protect independent merchants, but, unfortunately, the word "will" was a defect in the language of the amendment, because it would be necessary to prove that discrimination against small-business people actually would drive them out of business. That might be a very difficult thing to prove.

On the other hand, with the Carroll amendment, in which the word "may" was used, if it could be proved that discrimination might drive independent people out of business, that would be sufficient to protect them from unfair price discrimination.

We know that in many cases manufacturers might be in good faith in discriminating in favor of a large concern and against a small concern. The intention which Representative CARROLL had when he offered the amendment to which the House agreed was to protect small merchants from being driven out of business by unfair price discrimination.

I have always felt and always shall feel that section 1, which was passed by both Houses without amendment, is not good for the industry and commerce of the Nation. I feel that it will make possible again the same basing-point pricing system which the Supreme Court outlawed in the Cement case. The Supreme Court actually found that the cement companies of the United States were in conspiracy and had been in conspiracy for many years to deny the public the benefit of price competition. They had been using the element of freight absorption to arrive at identical prices. It is my fear, and I believe that if this bill should pass I would be proved to be correct, that the cement companies will go back to the identical pricing system they were using when the case was decided by the Supreme Court.

The Federal Trade Commission proved that the Cement Institute, including every large cement manufacturer in the country, was actually in conspiracy. That fact was proved by 50,000 pages of testimony and 49,000 pages of exhibits. It took 14 years to get a decision in that case by the Supreme Court, and all that time the Cement Institute was following a pricing practice which was monopolistic, which involved conspiracy, and involved robbing the public. After 14 years, when the case was finally won by the Federal Trade Commission, the Supreme Court simply said, "Stop this practice." No one went to jail, although the public had been robbed for 14 years since the case was brought, and for 30 years before the case ever reached the court. The cement companies, and everyone acquainted with this bill, know that once this bill is passed, even if the amendments intended to save small business are retained, the cement companies will go back to the same pricing system they had before this time.

What will be the effect if we enact section 1 of the bill? The effect will be that it will be necessary to prove conspiracy, because it will be completely legal to absorb freight in any manner so long as it cannot be proved that there is a conspiracy. We have included the words "acting independently" and "in good faith." We shall not be able to prove lack of good faith. We shall not be able to prove bad faith. The person who is accused will simply say he was meeting competition. He will say he simply found out what his competitor was charging, and he charged the same price.

In the event we do prove conspiracy, there will be no way, under this bill, if it is finally passed and becomes law, to break up the practice, even if we are able to prove the conspiracy. We can order the cement companies or the steel companies or the paper companies who may be charging identical prices throughout the entire Nation to quit conspiring; we may find them guilty and fine them, but we shall not be able to make them handle their pricing in such a way as to make them compete among themselves.

The law now says they cannot discriminate in their prices—and that includes freight absorption—in such way as to lessen, reduce, prevent, or destroy competition. Therefore, Mr. President, I feel that this is a bad bill, but I believe that the amendment proposed to be made in conference might be an improvement. In fact, I think it would be a substantial improvement, and therefore I shall not object to returning the bill to conference.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LONG. I yield for a question.

Mr. CAPEHART. Does the Senator agree with me, granted everything the Senator has just stated to be true—I do not agree that it is, nor do I deny that it is—that the only possible way we can cure what is now complained about is by passing a bill compelling all sellers to sell f. o. b. their places of business?

Mr. LONG. I do not agree with that at all. It is true there are certain nondiscriminatory ways of pricing products. If the same price is charged at the mill on all occasions, that would be nondiscriminatory. Everyone would have the advantage of the manufacturer's price if he would treat them all alike. On the other hand, I feel that it would not be a discrimination if the manufacturer absorbed all freight, in other words, if he simply said, "I am going to sell my product for $3.50 a barrel," if he were selling cement, or for $100 a ton, if he were selling steel—"No matter where I ship it in the United States, I will charge that particular price, and I will absorb freight for everybody." I am inclined to think that that system would not be discriminatory. It would treat all customers alike. But when they start in saying, "I will absorb a third of the freight bill for another, and two-thirds for somebody else, and absorb all the freight for another customer," they are discriminating in price. That discrimination is not illegal unless it eliminates, prevents, or destroys competition. That is the basis on which the Supreme Court outlawed it.

It is true that it may be difficult to find just exactly what the effect on competition is when one starts discriminating in his price. But the whole idea of the Clayton Act and the Robinson-Patman Act was that where we found discrimination in prices and the effect was injurious to competition, we should be able to eliminate and prevent that type of discrimination.

I feel that an effort has been made by the steel, cement, and other interests to try to make those engaged in honest business, who have never been in a conspiracy in their lives, feel that they were in danger of being held in violation of the antitrust laws.

The cement companies were found by the Supreme Court to be in conspiracy in violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act, to be in violation of the Clayton Act, and actually, I believe that if they had been prosecuted on the proper basis they would have been found to be in violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

Here are these violators going around to the entire Nation and trying to tell small merchants that they cannot discriminate. The only time they run into trouble is when they are discriminating in prices in interstate commerce, and when the effect of the discrimination may be to substantially injure competition or prevent competition.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. Does the Senator agree that a seller acting independently now under the law has a right to pay all the freight, absorb the freight, or equalize freight?

Mr. LONG. He has the right, except where it can be found that the effect of discrimination in his so doing would be to substantially injure, prevent, or destroy competition. That was the basis of count 2 of the Rigid Steel Conduit Co. case. If it is going to eliminate competition, the producer cannot discriminate in prices, even though he desires to do so.

If a man is selling to A. & P., or Safeway, or Kroger's and the only way he can get the business of those stores, we will say, is to give them a reduction, and if he does that, he may be in complete good faith, but if he does it without giving the other competitors the same prices, he is making a discrimination which would ultimately run the others out of business, and, therefore, he could be restrained.

Mr. CAPEHART. If he has a right to do that acting independently, then I again ask the Senator, will he not agree with me that the only possible way to avoid sellers getting together, as the Senator stated it a moment ago, would be to pass a law forcing all sellers to sell f. o. b. their places of business? How else could it be done?

Mr. LONG. Certainly, as the law stands today, the law prevents a man acting independently from making discrimination which, in the terms of the statute, may substantially injure, prevent, destroy, or eliminate competition. Today one cannot do it acting independently, and I do not feel he should be able to, if he is going to destroy competition.

Let us take a very good example. General Foods is one of the greatest distributors of canned goods and processed groceries in the entire United States. If General Foods, acting completely independently, should decide it was going to give every chain store in the Nation a 30-percent discount, even though it may be acting independently, and in good faith, it would not be permitted to make discriminations in prices, where that would have the effect of running many independent merchants out of business. I feel that a seller should not be able to make discriminations if the whole effect is to eliminate competition.

On the other hand, the discriminations which were practiced in the case of the cement industry were not made to keep any contractor from building a bridge, or keep anybody from acquiring cement to build houses. Those discriminations were made for the purpose of eliminating competition.

So they discriminated in their prices in terms of freight absorption. Sellers absorbed whatever amount of freight was necessary in order that they could say that they would not be competing in prices with the nearest mill. That is the practice of the cement companies, and they would like to go back and eliminate any competition, as would the paper industry, and as would the steel industry. But that is not in the best interests of the people of the United States, or we would not have passed the Sherman Antitrust Act, or any other act to keep people from eliminating competition among themselves.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. GRAHAM. Does the Senator understand that if the bill goes back to conference the Carroll amendment can still be considered as a part of the matters in conference?

Mr. LONG. It is my understanding, and I am sure the Chair would so rule, that the Carroll amendment can be considered by the conferees. I certainly hope it will be considered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I would like to clarify the parliamentary situation on S. 1008.

May I refer the Members of the Senate to the provisions of the Legislative Reorganization Act, effective the 2d of January 1947, governing the authority of conference committees? This is embodied in rule 27 of the Rules of the Senate. The authority of a conference committee under this rule is limited to matters which are in disagreement between the two Houses. But the conference committee has no power to change any wording or any matter upon which there is agreement between the two Houses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the original rule of the Senate. It was not changed by the Reorganization Act.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it not true that until the passage of the Reorganization Act conference committees had much broader powers than they now have? I remember that in the autobiography of George W. Norris, he said that there were three Houses here on Capitol Hill—the House, the Senate, and the conference committee. As I understand it, the powers of conference committees have been somewhat restricted by the amendment of the Legislative Reorganization Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. The remark of the Senator from Nebraska was, the Chair believes, based upon the fact that conferees occasionally brought in a complete substitute. He was eminently right in that respect, and the power of the conferees to bring in such a substitute was recognized by both Houses. But with respect to individual amendments, the rule which the Senator has just quoted is and has been a standing rule of the Senate for as long as the present occupant of the chair can remember.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Whatever the historical origin of the rule may be, it is certainly true that a conference committee is able to make only such changes as are justified by differences in the original wording between the House and the Senate versions of the measure. In the matter now before the Senate, S. 1008, the conference would be confined to certain passages of section 2, certain passages of section 3, and to section 4 (d).

Mr. President, I do not intend today to debate this whole subject, but I do believe the matter is so serious that a statement should be made about it.

Section 1 and section 2B of the bill which the conference committee will have no power whatsoever to change since the matter has already been agreed upon by both Houses, makes legal the basing-point system, by legalizing the three essential features of the basing-point system. The first of these features is a delivered price. In the basing-point industries buyers are not able to buy f. o. b. or at the mill of the seller. The seller insists that he must sell to the buyer not only the commodity, but also the freight, whether the freight be real or phantom. The buyer must take delivery at his own factory. He cannot take delivery at the point of sale. This is legalized under section 1, which says that—

> It shall not be an unfair method of competition * * * to quote or sell at delivered prices.

The second feature in the basing-point system is identity of price at any given location. Once the price leader fixes a base price and then fixes a price at every other point in the country equal to the base price plus the freight, the other alleged competitors then fix identical prices with those of the price leader. For example, if the price in Pittsburgh is $80 per ton, and the freight from Pittsburgh to Omaha is $40 a ton, and the price leader, which in the steel industry is United States Steel, therefore delivers steel in Omaha at $120 a ton, then a rival steel manufacturer in Kansas City or in Pueblo, Colo., also sells in Omaha at $120 a ton, the same price as United States Steel, irrespective of what their costs of production may have been, and irrespective of what the actual freight may be. Thus, under the basing-point system, any given buyer is always faced with exactly the same price quotations by all sellers. This feature is made legal by section 2B which says in part that it shall not be an unlawful discrimination in price for a seller "to absorb freight to meet the equally low price of a competitor in good faith."

The third feature in the basing-point system is the absorption of freight. This would be legalized by section 1, which says:

> It shall not be an unfair method of competition or an unfair or deceptive act or practice for a seller * * * to absorb freight.

Now the Federal Trade Commission has never moved to stop freight absorption unless it might tend to hurt competition. But under this bill it could be used as a part of the basing-point system which can tend to hurt competition. This comes about not merely when steel is sold at points farther west from the base points. There, of course, when the seller sells the steel at a delivered price he pays the freight charges to the railway company himself. But it is also true when a mill ships back toward the basing point. For instance, under Pittsburgh-plus with Pittsburgh as the basing point, a steel mill, let us say in St. Louis, is selling steel to St. Louis customers at $110 a ton—$80 base price plus $30 freight rates from Pittsburgh. If it sells to Cleveland where, let us say, the price is $80 plus $20 freight, or $100 a ton delivered, the steel mill in St. Louis will sell in Cleveland at $100 a ton and pay, let us say, $20 freight itself, and net only $80 at the mill. In many cases the western mill will ship eastward by absorbing freight and selling at lower prices eastward than in its home community, and on top of that deduct the freight. That means that the price they realize at the mill is still lower. In order, therefore, to sell eastward and quote the same price as eastern mills, they discriminate against their local customers. So we see that the three features of the basing-point system, the delivered price, identity of price, and freight absorption, are made legal by section 1 and by section 2B, which cannot be changed by the conference committee.

I think the Senate and the House should know what they are doing. The basing-point system is the method by which monopolies in the heavy industries fix prices and suppress competition. With variations it has been practiced in a large number of industries, such as lumber, lime, floor tile, gypsum, roofing, window glass, heating boilers, linseed oil, heavy chemicals, copper, zinc, lead, iron ore, paper and paper products, petroleum products, a large range of light chemicals, steel and cement, and many others as well. It was declared to be illegal by the United States Supreme Court in a series of cases—the Corn Products case, the Staley case, and finally the Cement case. It was declared by the Supreme Court to be a method of preventing competition and of violating the Sherman and the Clayton Acts. All that is needed is for the price leader to establish a base price and to sell at delivered prices consisting of the base price plus freight, and then all the other firms in the industry, without getting together, fix identical prices because they have in their possession freight books which show the freight from the base points to every place in the country. Once the price leader establishes the base price which fixes the prices over the country under the basing-point system, all the other firms need to do is to take that base price, look up the freight from the base place to every destination in the country, and then they quote identical prices. They do this regardless of where their mills are located or what freight they have to pay, or what their costs are.

It is very hard to prove that this is collusion or conspiracy. All that is necessary is for them to move together, and they do move together, and the effect is to destroy the competitive system of pricing in the United States. That is the effect.

I think we should legislate against effects. But section 1 and section 2 prevent us from doing that. I want to say that if the bill finally passes Congress and is approved by the President, the proper title for it should be "An act to nullify the Sherman Antitrust Act and an act to repeal the Clayton Act."

My very able colleague from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], whose services in this matter have been of the greatest service to the public, has, I think, correctly pointed out that the bill in its present form also repeals the Robinson-Patman Act. He points out that section 2B declares that it is not illegal to absorb freight to meet the equally low price of a competitor in good faith.

New price discrimination between buyers can be disguised in the form of freight absorption. The basing-point system will give identical prices in a given locality no matter where the goods are produced, no matter what the cost, and no matter what freight rates are paid. The Robinson-Patman Act, however, was designed to strike at discrimination between buyers in a given locality, so as to prevent the A. & P., for instance, or the large chain stores from buying at unjustifiably lower prices than their small competitors across the city square.

The bill before the Senate, however, says it is all right to absorb freight to meet the equally low price of a competitor in good faith. The discrimination can be given not in the form of an open-price discount, but in the form of a delivered price to one and not to the other. It can be a delivered price to the chain store with the freight absorbed, but the small man can be asked to pick up his goods at the factory and to pay his own freight or if the goods are delivered to him he can be charged the freight.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Does not section 2 go beyond that and provide further this language?—

> And this may include the maintenance, above or below the price of such competitor, of a differential in price which such seller customarily maintains.

I know that was not the purpose of that particular provision. Nevertheless, could not that provision also be used by someone who was discriminating in favor of certain of his customers by virtue of the fact that other people were doing it, and permit him to make further discriminations in view of the fact that he would customarily make a price below what someone else would make?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Louisiana has mentioned that point, because in the case he mentions we have specifically written into the bill the provision that goods can be sold at lower differentials to one customer than are given to another. That is a direct authorization. I was merely trying to show that the first part of 2B permits discrimination under the guise of an absorption of freight.

The wording to which the Senator from Louisiana has called attention, and the first part of the sentence which I previously quoted were both agreed to by both the House and the Senate, and therefore it will be impossible for the conference committee to effect any change in those provisions.

Similarly, section 3 was largely agreed to, except insofar as differences existed between the Kefauver and Carroll amendments. Very little change can be made in section 3. The bill will therefore come back to the Senate in about the same condition as it is now in. The principal change which can be made is in section 4D. I take it from the statement of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], that while the conference committee is not estopped from considering certain sentences in sections 2 and 3, at present the main change which is contemplated is merely a change in section 4D.

Mr. President, as I said, I think if we pass the bill we are repealing the antitrust laws of the Nation. I think we ought to know what we are doing. We Senators believe in free competition, but if we pass this bill we are pulling the teeth of the Federal Trade Commission Act, pulling the teeth of the Clayton Act and pulling the teeth of the Robinson-Patman Act.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] and Representative CARROLL in a desperate attempt, when they saw all this happening, tried to insert some false teeth in the jaws of the antitrust laws. But false teeth are simply not as good as real teeth which we should never pull out in the first place by passing S. 1008.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. I asked the Senator to yield in order to make an interpolation which may not have much legal sense, but the thought comes to me that, in order to obviate the difficulty which the Senator from Illinois enunciates it perhaps might be well to insert an amendment to the effect that any or all laws or parts of any law which contravene the principles and tenets and ideals of the Sherman antitrust law and the Clayton Act are hereby repealed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the Senator mean that it should be stated openly that all the antitrust laws are being repealed?

Mr. TOBEY. Yes. Hang a sign up in the sky which he who runs may read, so that when anyone votes for that amendment or against it we can know whether he is in favor of or in opposition to the antitrust laws of the country.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the legislation were ever to pass the Senate I think I would move to change the title in conformity with the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am very glad to yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. I wonder whether the Senator will agree with me that insofar as the Sherman Act is concerned, that act will not be repealed by this measure, at least to the extent that so long as a conspiracy can be proved, those who are conspiring can be ordered to stop conspiring.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But generally it is not possible to prove a conspiracy.

Mr. LONG. But, actually, so far as the Sherman Act is concerned, if it can be proved that a conspiracy exists, those who are conspiring can be ordered to stop conspiring. However, the difficulty in the present instance is that even if they are ordered to stop conspiring, they cannot be made to stop doing what they were doing when they were conspiring, namely, eliminating competition between themselves.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is the point exactly.

Mr. LONG. The Robinson-Patman Act would stop such elimination of competition. However, that could not be done if this measure, as now proposed, is enacted into law.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I think this is a bad bill. I am sorry to say the Senate has not been given time to put its mind on this matter. As originally introduced, the bill introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] was a measure calling for a 2-year moratorium. Then, on the second day of debate on this matter in the spring—on the first of June, I believe—this bill was hastily substituted, without hearings and without full discussion. There was some discussion of the bill on the floor of the Senate, but even then it was not as full as it should have been.

Now the bill returns from conference, and is to be sent back to conference again. When it returns to us from the further conference, we shall be asked to vote in favor of sections 1, 2, and 3, unless our good friends on the Judiciary Committee see the light and "hit the sawdust trail." We shall be asked to vote without proper hearings, and the result will inevitably be bad, because it is not possible to write good legislation on such a complicated subject on the floor of the Senate, without proper hearings. I think the present situation is a clear demonstration of the correctness of that statement.

So, Mr. President, if we pass such a bill, we might as well say good-by to the antitrust laws in the United States.

I am very sorry that the Department of Justice has given the opinion it has. I understood the Senator from Maryland to state that the Department of Justice did not disagree over sections 1, 2, and 3, but merely disagreed as to section 4D. Did I correctly understand the Senator?

Mr. O'CONOR. The Senator from Illinois is correct in that statement.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Very well. Well, Mr. President, I am very sorry about that. I think it is a great mistake on the part of the Department of Justice. It pains me very deeply.

But merely because the Department of Justice has made an error, that does not mean that the Senate of the United States should compound that error. We should certainly exercise our right of independent judgment. This measure would repeal the decisions of the United States Supreme Court. I am struck by the fact that whenever decisions upholding competition are handed down by the Supreme Court, or there is a possibility of such a decision, then someone introduces a measure in the Congress to comfort those restraining competition.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am very glad to yield for a question.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Does not the Senator think the Department of Justice is in a very inconsistent position in having at least joined in the prosecution in the Standard Oil case, which has just been argued in the Supreme Court, when it is admitted that if this measure is enacted into law it will make that question academic? In other words, the Department of Justice apparently wants to have Congress pass a bill which will take away the effectiveness of the decisions it asks from the Supreme Court.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; the Senator is entirely correct on that point. Mr. President, I think the fort has been surrendered by the Department of Justice.

There is too much of a tendency, however, on the part of legislators to protect monopoly when the courts are trying to protect competition. That movement began a few years ago when the Supreme Court in the Southeastern Underwriters case declared fire-insurance companies to be engaged in interstate commerce. What happened then, Mr. President? Congress then passed a law taking the fire-insurance companies out of interstate commerce, and putting them back under State regulation, which, because of the 48 conflicting jurisdictions, would largely be ineffective.

Then Governor Arnall started suit against the railways for their combinations fixing freight rates which had the effect of imposing excessive freight rates on the South and on the West. I am sorry to say that Governor Arnall was not properly supported by the South and the West in regard to the decisions which he succeeded in having made.

Then what happened? The Reed-Bulwinkle bill was passed which permitted the railroads to get together and make combinations and to fix freight rates. Thank heavens, the President vetoed that bill; but Congress passed it over his veto.

These are two instances in which the Supreme Court defended or might have defended the right of competition, namely, in the case of fire insurance and the fixing of railroad rates, but the Congress then stepped in and restored the power of the monopolies.

That is what is happening in the present case. The Supreme Court ruled out the basing-point system in three cases, concluding with the Cement case in 1948, because, it said, it permitted monopolies to fix prices all over the country; and that the example of the price leader was being followed by all the other concerns in the industry. Then the move started to seek to have the Congress repeal these decisions, and then to have the Congress postpone their effects for several years.

Now we have this measure which would repeal these decisions which were based on our present antitrust laws.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am very glad to yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. Has not the situation fairly well reached the point where, although many of us had the idea that the United States Supreme Court was the court of last resort, yet it seems that, so far as the major industries of the country are concerned, the Congress of the United States is the court of last resort? In other words, every time the courts find that the major industries are using practices which would create a monopoly and would eliminate competition in the Nation, the companies involved appeal to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I undertake to say that whenever the Federal Trade Commission Act or the Clayton Act or the Robinson-Patman Act are interpreted by the courts in a way to preserve competition, Congress then rushes in to protect the monopolists.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the platforms of the Democratic Party and the Republican Party on the question of monopoly. Those planks are very brief.

I read now from the Democratic platform:

> We advocate the strengthening of existing antitrust laws by closing the gaps which experience has shown have been used to promote the concentration of economic power.
> We pledge a positive program to promote competitive business and to foster the development of independent trade and commerce.

I ask the Senator if he can imagine anything that would be more opposed to the policy of the Democratic platform therein stated than the passage of this basing-point legislation which wrecks the Clayton Act and certainly weakens the Sherman Act and fosters, instead of reduces, monopolies.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The bill proposed is a plain violation of the principles of the Democratic platform.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; I yield for a further question.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Quoting from the Republican Party's platform:

> Small business, the bulwark of American enterprise, must be encouraged through aggressive antimonopoly action, elimination of unnecessary controls, protection against discrimination, correction of tax abuses, and limitation of competition by governmental organizations.

Can the distinguished Senator think of anything that would damage small business more than this basing-point legislation, whereas the Republican Party's platform says the Republicans wish to encourage and protect small business?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I say to the Senator from Tennessee that perhaps I view that statement in the platform with prejudiced eyes, but, frankly, I never took it seriously; I never thought they meant it. But if the Republicans, as represented in this Chamber by the Senators on the other side of the aisle, do mean that plank, and did mean it when it was adopted by the Republican Party, the way for them to prove that they meant it then, and mean it now, is to vote down this measure.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I call attention to the fact that also in the platform of the Democratic Party it is stated that—

> Small business * * * must be protected against unfair discrimination and monopoly.

But, Mr. President, this measure certainly is not antimonopoly action. It is action to relieve monopolies from the force and effect of antimonopoly action, entirely in the teeth of both the Democratic and the Republican platforms. Does the Senator agree as to that?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Tennessee is entirely correct.

This measure is a promonopoly measure. It will increase the prices which the fabricators of goods will have to pay for the raw materials coming from the South and the West. Therefore, it will discourage new concerns from engaging in mass-production industries, as long as the system prevails, because they will not be able to obtain the stock they need at the lower local prices which the advantages of competition would otherwise permit them to do. This measure will restrict competition in industry, will jack up prices, and will restrict investment. It will have all those bad consequences and many others as well.

However, Mr. President, I wish to reserve until a later time a full analysis of the bad features of the bill.

At this time I merely wish to point out that whatever the conference committee does, it will have to come back, under the rules of the Senate, with a bad bill. I had hoped that we could fight this thing out today and on Monday and on the other days in the first part of next week, that we could reach a decision now and kill the bill because that is the only proper answer—death to this bill. But the very able Senator from Maryland has asked that it be recommitted to the conference committee. I am willing to postpone the fight, but I am not going to give up the fight. And I am not indulging in mock heroics when I say that, either. It is a bad bill now. By changing 4D it may be a little less bad when it comes back, but it will still be a bad bill.

I am only one Member of the United States Senate, but, so far as I am concerned, I am going to fight it when it comes back, because the conference committee cannot make it a decent measure. I think there will be other Senators who will stand with me. While I am sorry that the Department of Justice has, in effect, given up its antitrust attitude in these matters, I am not going to let that deter me. I am going to hold to the Democratic platform, and I hope that, if the bill should pass the Senate and should pass the House, it will then be sent back to us from the White House with a ringing veto from our President.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LONG. In line with the Senator's statement, I wondered whether he recalls that, some time ago, an assistant attorney general referred to the Department of Justice having for many years given only lip service to the antitrust laws. I wonder whether he will agree with me that while the Department of Justice is talking about the suit filed against the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., at the same time it is permitting the one law which has done more to enable small concerns to compete than any other one thing, to be emasculated so that the small concerns will have no real protection under the law. I wonder whether the Senator agrees with me that certainly we know that if the Department of Justice stands idly by and watches existing legislation being repealed, it will have done irreparably greater harm to small business than could be offset by a hundred A. & P. suits?

Mr. DOUGLAS. This decision by the Department of Justice gives away the entire case against monopoly.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, when the bill came before the Judiciary Committee, it was very carefully considered. As I now remember, we spent several months on it. When the subcommittee made its report, the bill was discussed further by the main committee. After all the discussion had been had, I felt that I could not support the bill. I therefore prepared minority views. I desire to read a portion of the minority views, because I think it emphasizes what is basically wrong with the pending bill. From the minority views, I read as follows:

> The proposed amendment to the antitrust laws, as contained in S. 1008, should not be passed for the following reasons:
> 1. S. 1008 introduces new terms and phrases into the antitrust laws, without providing any definitions or standards for their interpretation, and thus confuses the law instead of clarifying it. The antitrust statutes of this country represent an established body of law which the Congress framed with infinite pains in choosing exact words to convey congressional intent. Through many years of judicial interpretation, these words have come to have definite meanings which are understood by both business and the legal profession. It is like throwing sand into a gear box to force new words and phrases into this carefully developed body of law without giving a clue to their intended meaning. Specifically, the proposed bill contains four new undefined phrases:
> (a) "Engaging in competition."
> (b) "Absorb freight."
> (c) "In any and all markets."

As the distinguished Senator from Louisiana said a little while ago, it took 14 years in court, in a single case, to get a phrase defined. As the distinguished Presiding Officer [Mr. O'MAHONEY] knows, these phrases have come to mean certain things both to business interests and to lawyers. Yet we find here four undefined phrases. "Engaging in competition" has never been defined by the courts. "Absorb freight"—what does it mean? It has never been defined by the courts. "In any and all markets"—what does that mean? "Delivered prices."

> None of these phrases has even been tested in the courts. It is uncertain whether "engaging in competition" will be held to include (a) only the behavior characteristic of businessmen in a competitive industry, (b) also the tactics of enterprises that seek more business by discriminations that destroy their small competitors, or (c) also the limited rivalry for orders that exists under price formulas which produce identical delivered prices. That the latter constitutes "engaging in competition" has been the fundamental and persistent defense of many of the respondents in the Federal Trade Commission's price-fixing cases.
> It is uncertain whether "absorbing freight" will be interpreted as reducing a delivered price by an amount not greater than the freight cost actually incurred upon the particular shipment, or by an amount not greater than the applicable rail freight charge even when goods are shipped more cheaply by water or truck, or by an amount not greater than the freight cost from the seller's plant nearest the point of delivery even if shipment is made from a more remote point, or by an amount not greater than the freight cost from the seller's most remote plant even if shipment is made from a nearer plant.

Mr. President, those of us who live in the Northwest are sick and tired of the old formula "Pittsburgh plus," with which every Senator is thoroughly familiar. I regret to say no other member of the Judiciary Committee would join me in the minority views, though I am entirely satisfied the minority views were absolutely right. I further said:

> It is uncertain whether the term "market" will be interpreted as a local area subject to a single freight rate, so that within any one such area a single seller would obtain no immunity for variations in his delivered prices or whether smaller areas might be regarded as markets so that, by different degrees of freight absorption, a seller might establish more than one delivered price even within an area covered by a single freight rate.
> It is uncertain whether delivered prices will be interpreted to mean only prices in transactions in which, under the general law of sales, ownership passes to the buyer at the delivery point, or whether they will be interpreted to include prices like those of the cement industry, in which the seller quoted a price at the buyer's place of business but passed legal title to the buyer at the seller's mill.
> In view of these uncertainties the meaning of the bill depends almost wholly upon judicial interpretation of the broad and inherently ambiguous term "good faith."

I may say, Mr. President, I do not quite agree that the Supreme Court is the court of last resort. I say the Congress ought to define terms so clearly that there would be no ambiguity at all.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I should like to say to the Senator that I for one read his minority views, and I feel they were probably the first warning we had of what was to be included in the bill (S. 1008) when it was reported and that its effect would be greatly to weaken the antitrust laws. I feel that the Senator from North Dakota is to be highly complimented upon the fact that, although, as I recall, the Senator was not a member of the subcommittee, yet, as a member of the Judiciary Committee he pointed out what would be the effect of the bill when it was reported by the committee.

Mr. LANGER. I am very grateful to the Senator from Louisiana. I thank him.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to associate myself with the Senator from Louisiana in the comments which he has made about the Senator from North Dakota. His dissent was the fire bell clanging in the night to summon the lovers of competition to arms.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Quoting further from my minority views:

The ambiguity of these phrases is reinforced by lack of clarity in the use of them. It is uncertain whether the phrase "for the purpose of engaging in competition in good faith in any and all markets" is intended to be applicable only to freight absorption or also to quotation and sale at delivered prices.

It is submitted that a proposed bill which inserts into an established body of law new words and phrases which are undefined and may be subject to widely varying interpretations not only represents poor draftsmanship but, of more importance, will necessarily muddle the law instead of clarifying it, and should not become the law of the land.

(2) S. 1008 will, in practical reality, permit monopolistic practices to develop which the supporters of the legislation undoubtedly do not intend should be permitted. Congress must consider not only a bill's theoretical effects but also its practical results.

In practice, business enterprises will be free to disregard the limitations which the supporters of the bill intend to retain. This is so because the bill's ambiguous language will need to be interpreted by the Supreme Court and proceedings for this purpose cannot be decided until several years after the moratorium expires. Aware of this obvious fact, business enterprises will be able to interpret the bill as they choose and thus to justify a variety of monopolistic practices that are now illegal. When the Supreme Court decides against them the moratorium will have expired, and the Court's affirmation of a cease-and-desist order will provide no punishment nor relief.

It is submitted that a bill which throws the gate open to monopolistic practices not contemplated by its supporters should not become the law of the land.

(3) S. 1008 sets the clock back many years in the enforcement of the antitrust laws against discrimination by replacing the test of effect with the test of purpose or intent. The antitrust laws can be effectively enforced when they forbid activities which have monopolistic effects. Effects can be observed and proved.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the minority views may be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the remainder of the minority views was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

But when the legality or illegality of a practice depends, not on its effect, but on its purpose, the law cannot be effectively enforced unless the enforcement agencies become mind readers. To avoid the obstacles which such a legal standard created was one of the principal reasons for the enactment of the Robinson-Patman Act. It would be tragic if this test of intent, which for many years constituted the principal means by which monopolistic firms were able to evade the purpose of the antitrust laws and which was specifically taken out of those laws by congressional enactment, should now be placed back into the law as the test of violation.

To be specific, price discriminations which injure competition are now forbidden by the Clayton Act unless the price differences can be justified by differences in cost. But under S. 1008 a price discrimination through absorbing freight would be lawful no matter how seriously it might injure competition, provided its purpose was to engage in competition in good faith. Thus no violation of law could be proved unless the Government could prove that the hearts of the discriminators are not pure. Even the orders of the Federal Trade Commission terminating violations of law by the conduit producers and by the United States Steel Corp. would be suspended insofar as they limit the right of these concerns to absorb freight, unless the Government could show that those who disregarded these orders acted with a bad purpose.

It is submitted that a bill which reintroduces the mystical and psychic concept of intent as the test of violation would put antitrust enforcement back into the Dark Ages and therefore should not become the law of the land.

4. S. 1008 will legalize, through the use which can be made of freight absorption, certain monopolistic acts and practices which have been specifically held to be illegal by the courts.

(a) The basing-point system: Since each firm in an industry will be able to absorb freight from its own mill, all mills will be able to quote identical delivered prices at any delivery point by suitably varying the amounts of their respective freight absorptions. This can be done automatically if every mill establishes a mill price and regards the mill prices of all other mills as base prices governing the delivered prices in territory contiguous to those mills. The amount of any mill's freight absorption to any destination will then become whatever is required to equal the sum of the mill price at the governing mill plus the freight from that governing mill to the destination. The result will be a complete basing-point system, with every mill a base and all delivered prices identical, by formula, at every delivery point. The participating mills can then defy the antitrust agencies to prove that this result is due to conspiracy, since the means by which it is achieved have been specifically sanctioned by law.

(b) Phantom freight: Neither the bill nor the present law imposes any limit upon the height of a seller's factory price, nor is it practicable or desirable to impose any such limit. Under the basing-point system phantom freight was charged when a mill distant from a base included freight from the basing point in the delivered price to a nearby customer. Under the bill the name of the practice must be changed, but the practice will continue. Now the mill may quote a factory price as high as the former delivered price at the factory door; and when it sells to a nearby customer at the same delivered price as before, it will say it is absorbing freight instead of charging phantom freight. Phantom freight meant price discrimination between customers and a handicap to industrial development in the areas where prices were high. Consequently the practice has been almost universally condemned, both in Congress and elsewhere. Changing the name of the practice will not change its results. Phantom freight by any other name would smell the same.

It is submitted that a proposed bill that legalizes monopolistic acts and practices, particularly such practices as the basing-point system and phantom freight, which have specifically been held to be illegal by the courts, should not become the law of the land.

5. S. 1008 constitutes an unwarranted encroachment on the normal functions of the judiciary. Notwithstanding the memorandum on the constitutionality of the bill which forms appendix A to the committee's report, the bill does impose an arbitrary rule of determination upon the courts. It tells the courts how the statutes in question are to be construed and also tells them that they would not be construed as the courts have construed them in the recent past. As the Supreme Court said in United States v. Klein, quoted in the committee's report. "the Court is forbidden to give the effect to evidence which in its own judgment such evidence should have and is directed to give it an effect precisely contrary."

For 35 years the construction and application of the statutes forbidding unfair methods of competition and price discrimination which promote monopoly or injure competition have been undergoing a gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion. That process has been continuing since amendment of the Clayton Act by the Robinson-Patman Act in 1936 and since amendment of the Federal Trade Commission Act by the Wheeler-Lea amendment of 1938.

The theory of the Federal Trade Commission Act from its beginning in 1914 has been to prevent restraints of trade in their incipiency.

The Supreme Court expounded the theory of incipient restraint in the Cement Institute case decided a year ago. It said that "a major purpose" of the Federal Trade Commission Act "as we have frequently said, was to enable the Commission to restrain practices as 'unfair' which, although not yet having grown into Sherman Act dimensions would most likely do so if left unrestrained. The Commission and the courts were to determine what conduct, even though it might then be short of a Sherman Act violation, was an 'unfair method of competition.' This general language was deliberately left to the 'Commission and the courts' for definition because it was thought that 'There is no limit to human inventiveness in this field'; that consequently, a definition that fitted practices known to lead toward an unlawful restraint of trade today would not fit tomorrow's new inventions in the field; and that for Congress to try to keep its precise definitions abreast of this course of conduct would be an 'endless task.'" (See Federal Trade Commission v. R. F. Keppel & Bro. (291 U. S. 304, 310–312), and congressional committee reports there quoted (333 U. S. 683, 708–709).)

It is submitted that a bill which represents an invasion into the proper sphere of the judiciary and thus tends to weaken the traditional separation of the powers provided for by the Constitution should not become the law of the land.

To summarize, S. 1008 should not be passed because (1) it represents poor and slipshod draftsmanship, introducing new and undefined phrases into the antitrust laws; (2) it will have the practical effect of immunizing numerous monopolistic acts and practices which the supporters of the bill undoubtedly do not believe should be permitted; (3) it will make the antitrust laws against discrimination almost impossible of effective enforcement by substituting intent and purpose for effect of the test of violations; (4) it will legalize, through the use that can be made of freight absorption, certain monopolistic acts and practices, namely, the basing-point system and phantom freight, which have been specifically held to be illegal by the courts; and (5) it represents an unwarranted intrusion by the legislative branch of Government into the proper sphere of the judiciary.

The fundamental effect of S. 1008 is to make it impossible for the antitrust laws to keep abreast of the changing forms and disguises of monopoly. As the Yale Law Review stated in its issue of February 1949:

"The cases culminating in the new Cement decision have caught up with delivered-price systems and recognized them for what they are. The courts have thus informed business once more that the antitrust laws are concerned with illegal results, and not with the techniques employed to achieve them. The cases may make businessmen uncomfortable, but the peace of mind of monopoly is not yet a recognized reward for economic endeavors."

Finally, it must be remembered at all times that the world today is undergoing a battle of ideas between Communist collectivism on the one hand and individual free enterprise on the other. It is a known fact that the Communist propagandists regard the existence of monopolies in this country as the Achilles heel in our defense of free enterprise. Any action which we take which surrenders the power of the people to the power of monopoly will immediately be seized upon by the Communist propagandists and spread throughout the world as proof of the fact that America is not a land of individual free enterprise but is actually under the control of monopolistic big business. We can ill afford at this critical stage in world affairs to provide our Communist foes with concrete proof of the correctness of their propaganda.

For these reasons it is recommended that S. 1008 not be passed.

If, however, the Congress feels that some form of legislation on this issue must be passed, it should undertake to confirm the legality of innocent practices without providing immunity for monopolistic practices by adding an amendment at the end of section 1 of the bill. Such an amendment should read as follows:

"Provided, That this shall not legalize any violations of said acts which may appear in such delivered prices or freight absorptions.

"Provided, however, That nothing herein shall legalize any act or practice now unlawful because of bad faith, discrimination, coercion, oppression, or a tendency to injure, suppress, or eliminate competition.

"Provided, That this shall not legalize monopolistic practices or discriminations which injure competition and are not shown to be in good faith."

WILLIAM LANGER.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, someone may ask, What is the solution? Certainly the conference report is not the solution. In my opinion, it is worse than was the original bill itself.

I want to associate myself with the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] in saying that when the bill comes back I shall most certainly join them in their fight to defeat it.

In conclusion, let me say that I endeavored to give a solution in the last paragraph of my minority views. I said that if the bill were amended, the amendment should read as follows:

Provided, That this shall not legalize any violations of said acts which may appear in such delivered prices or freight absorptions: Provided, however, That nothing herein shall legalize any act or practice now unlawful because of bad faith, discrimination, coercion, oppression, or a tendency to injure, suppress, or eliminate competition: Provided, That this shall not legalize monopolistic practices or discriminations which injure competition and are not shown to be in good faith.

Mr. President, from one end of my State to the other protests have been received from small businesses located in Fargo, Jamestown, Bismarck, Minot, Grand Forks, and many other places. Small-business men have been practically unanimous, because not one telegram in favor of the enactment of this measure has come to my attention.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, and the distinguished Senator from Illinois for the fine fight they have made in behalf of small business, and, I believe, for all the common people of this country.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I have in mind, for the reason which I shall hereafter state, moving that the conferees be instructed not to report back to the Senate until after June 30. We know that after the decision of the Supreme Court in the Cement case, and also after the question was last discussed on the floor of the Senate, there was a great cry about the calamity which would befall the Nation, but we have not yet seen that calamity occur. There have been no ghost-towns created, no closing of plants, no moving of fabricators to production centers such as Detroit, Pittsburgh, and Cleveland. Instead, the record indicates that new production plants have been opened up by the cement industry and there is evidence indicating the development of new steel and fabricating plants. There is also new evidence that industry can and does absorb freight, and no one considers the right to absorb freight or to sell at delivered prices illegal per se. It is only illegal when there is a conspiracy to fix prices and defeat the antitrust laws.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I wonder if the Senator agrees with me that it should not be necessary actually to prove a conspiracy where, by joint collateral action, several competitors are charging identical prices, even though it may be impossible to prove that there is actually a conspiracy afoot. Where the effect is the same as it would be by reason of conspiracy, and injury to competition is present although it is impossible to prove that conspiracy is actually present. I have in mind the type of situation in which there is a conspiracy, but it is impossible to prove the conspiracy although we can prove that by joint action the competitors have eliminated price competition.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Where there is an arrangement whereby all have the same price, by use of the basing-point system, it is usually difficult to prove that there is an illegal conspiracy. We know these things are sometimes not worked out on paper and it is very hard to prove a conspiracy by overt acts, such as letters, memoranda, and so forth. So I agree with the distinguished Senator fully.

Mr. President, since there has been no calamity to business since the decision in the Cement case, and since this bill was originally introduced, there is no need for hurry. Congress should have the opportunity to determine exactly what Senate bill 1008 does and what its effect could be, not only on the economy as represented by the great corporations but on small retailers, manufacturers, distributors, and processors.

Both the Senate and the House were told by the sponsors of the bill that there was no intention to scuttle the Robinson-Patman Act, and yet when the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana case was argued in the Supreme Court, counsel for the Standard Oil Co., in answer to a question by Justice Black, said that in his opinion section 3 of the pending conference report would render a decision of the Supreme Court unnecessary. The case would be made moot as a result of congressional action.

Mr. President, I have here the Daily Report for Executives, which is a highly reliable report to the executives of the Nation, from Washington, which contains a colloquy between Justice Black and Mr. Herbert Ellis when the case was being argued before the Supreme Court. Who is Mr. Herbert Ellis? He is counsel for the Standard Oil Co. of Louisiana.

Justice Black was interested in the effect of the O'Mahoney bill. He wanted to know what effect it would have on the present proceeding before the Supreme Court. Mr. Ellis said that if the House version is accepted, the doctrine of the circuit court would be reversed. Here, according to the report, is what the counsel for Standard Oil said would be done by this bill:

Justice BLACK. What does it do with the defense?

Mr. ELLIS. It says it will be a complete defense.

So, Mr. President, we are asked today to send back to conference this bill with the expectation that something will be brought back for approval by the Senate. The bill would reverse the action of the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals and take away the protection which small business and the people of the Nation have had from section 2 of the Robinson-Patman Act. It would declare, as a matter of policy, that if anyone is meeting competition, regardless of what kind of discrimination may be engaged in, what effect it might have upon business, whether it is a justified discrimination or not, the mere showing of meeting competition in good faith would be a complete defense. The passage of this bill would be the worst catastrophe that ever happened to the small businesses of this Nation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I wonder if the Senator would be willing to withhold his motion to postpone consideration in order that we might expedite the matter and save the time of the Senate. Some of us feel that the conference may be able to arrive at some agreement whereby the amendment offered by the Senator or the amendment offered by Representative CARROLL, of Colorado, might be preserved. I am certainly hopeful of that. I wonder if the Senator would be willing to withhold his motion and wait to see what the effect of the conference report actually will be.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I have not been in on any agreements about what is going to happen in conference. If some agreement has been made by Members of the Senate who see things as I do with other Members of the Senate who are sponsoring the bill we are discussing, of course, I desire to go along, but I do wish to point out that nowhere along the line have the sponsors of the legislation, either in the Senate or in the House of Representatives, even been willing to agree to any amendments which would protect the Robinson-Patman Act. They have made the bill worse every time they had a chance of doing so. The conference report we have before us today is worse than the original bill which was presented by the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]; it is worse than the bill that was passed by the Senate, it is worse than the bill that came out of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House. Instead of securing some relief from the conference committee, we seem to be getting a worse and worse bill, more destructive, more damaging to small business all along.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator was not present on the floor at the time, but I did discuss with the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], and also with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] the possibility that the Senator from Tennessee would be a member of the conference, and I hope that may be possible in order that we might have a better chance of working out some amendments which would give effective protection to the small-business interests.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I thank the Senator, and perhaps later during the discussion I shall have an opportunity of speaking with the Senator from Louisiana and others relative to the matter.

This whole consideration should be deferred until at least June 30, and the conference committee should not report until that time, since there is a case involving the question we are discussing in the Supreme Court, the Standard Oil Co. case, from the Seventh Circuit, which was argued just about 10 days ago. It will probably be April or May before the Supreme Court hands down a decision in the case. It seems to me that we should wait until that decision is handed down, and then we will be better able to draft legislation.

Mr. President, this case was argued in the Supreme Court on the 9th and 10th of January. One of the questions which the Senate must decide at this time is whether it wants to legislate a Supreme Court decision out of existence without giving the Court an opportunity to rule on the question at issue.

Mr. Herbert Ellis, the counsel for the Standard Oil Co., says that if this bill is enacted in the form in which it is here today, we will be deciding the Supreme Court case in favor of the Standard Oil Co., that is, that the oil company can make any price discriminations it cares to make when it comes up with the evidence that it is meeting competition of just one as seller, and then the small man who has been discriminated against has no redress whatsoever.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Did I understand the Senator correctly to say that was the actual statement of the attorney for the Standard Oil Co. before the United States Supreme Court, that the passage of this bill as reported by the conference would decide that case in favor of the Standard Oil Co.?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That was his statement not only once, but according to the report of the colloquy, which I am certain is correct, it was his statement twice. He said that if this bill shall be passed by Congress, the Standard Oil Co. will have won the Standard Oil case, it will have become a moot question. In other words, the large companies could then discriminate against any little fellows they desired to discriminate against, as they were trying to do in the Detroit case, and make the defense that they were meeting competition, which would be a complete defense. It completely nullifies section 2 of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, which I certainly do not think we want to repeal. I have the exact colloquy, the questions and answers, and Mr. Ellis' statement.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, does the Senator recall how long the discrimination against which these independent gasoline operators are complaining has been in effect, and about what time that litigation started?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I have here somewhere the opinion of the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, which was written by the present Supreme Court Justice Minton. The discrimination began at least by January 1, 1938, and has been pending all this time.

Mr. LONG. Then, that would be a good indication that these independent merchants are trying to protect themselves and trying to have the antitrust laws enforced. For 12 years they have been trying to get the law enforced, and just about the time they get their case into the Supreme Court, Congress would change the law in favor of the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That would be the effect of it. This opinion by Circuit Judge Minton, now Supreme Court Justice Minton, which was concurred in by the other members of the seventh circuit court of appeals, is an excellent opinion. I do not believe any Member of the Senate could read the opinion of the court in that case without agreeing that these small independent oil dealers were entitled to the protection they sought, and which they secured under the Robinson-Patman Act. Now, when they are about to win their case in the Supreme Court, for the Senate of the United States to make their case moot and take away their protection under the decision of the seventh circuit court, is an unreasonable action, in my opinion.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I agree completely with the Senator in his feeling in this matter, although I certainly hope the Senator will withhold his motion at this time in order that this measure may go to conference, and so that we may see what the conference will report. When the conference report comes in, possibly we will be informed as to when this decision may be handed down by the Supreme Court.

Mr. KEFAUVER. What killed the protection, and makes the Standard Oil case moot, is not section 4, which I think is what the conference wants to change, but it is section 3 of the bill, which makes the meeting of competition a full defense.

Of course, if the sponsors of the bill would be willing to say they were going to rework the bill so as not to legislate against a possible decision in the Standard Oil case, I might have a different opinion about it. But I have not heard any such statement from any of the sponsors of the bill. It seems to me that what the bill is intended to do is what the distinguished Senator from Louisiana has said. Standard Oil has lost a lawsuit, and just before the case is to be decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, is legislation to be enacted by Congress against the interests of the small-business men and in the interest of the Standard Oil Co.? That would be the effect. These little merchants have been fighting for this protection 11 long years, and finally got into court, and are about to get a favorable decision. Then a law is passed which takes away the benefit of that decision.

Let me say, Mr. President, that we have before us now a new bill, in effect, written by the conference committee, with which even they are not satisfied, which they want to write again. They made it so bad that even the conference committee does not want their last product. We have no chance of hearing, no opportunity of considering, what the Supreme Court is going to do.

We were told that the bill dealt with freight absorption and delivered prices, and not with the Robinson-Patman Act. That was when the bill was originally before the Senate. Yet we are now told that the bill would, if enacted into law, render the whole question raised by the Standard Oil Co. case a dead issue. I think we should wait to see what the Supreme Court does before we act on the conference report.

Mr. President, I therefore think we could legislate and consider this matter more intelligently, that we could arrive at a better conclusion, if either the considerations here today were postponed, or if a conference committee were appointed to study the matter and wait until the Supreme Court decision is handed down in the case, which has recently been argued.

So as matters now stand it is my intention to offer a motion to have the conferees—unless they are willing to agree to delay their report—report at some time which will be after the decision of the Supreme Court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I wish to speak for only a minute or two. I have spent days and days studying this subject. I deny that the passage of the legislation before us will injure small business. In fact, in my opinion, it will help small business. If I thought it would not I would be opposed to it.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President——

Mr. CAPEHART. I deny, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CAPEHART. I am happy to yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. May I ask the Senator if he does not think that emasculation of the Robinson-Patman Act would injure small business?

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I deny that the bill would emasculate the Robinson-Patman Act.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Does the Senator from Indiana deny that the counsel for the Standard Oil Co. of Louisiana, Mr. Herbert Ellis, in a colloquy with Mr. Justice Black in the argument of the Standard Oil case, said that if this bill were passed it would make that case moot; that it would be, in effect, a decision in favor of the Standard Oil Co. and a reversal of the decision of the circuit court of appeals?

Mr. CAPEHART. I have not seen that statement. I heard the Senator say that they were about to lose their case in the Supreme Court, meaning that the Supreme Court was going to rule against them. Anyone——

Mr. KEFAUVER. Let me make the matter clear.

Mr. CAPEHART. I refuse to yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana refuses to yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I further want to say that if the bill is so injurious to business as those opposed to it say it is, and if the bill, if passed, would injure small business as those who are opposed to it say it will, I promise them that I will join with them at any later date to repeal the legislation, because I am just as much opposed to weakening the antitrust laws, I am just as much opposed to weakening the Robinson-Patman Act as they are. I am just as much interested in protecting small business as they are.

I have studied the problem very carefully, and I am just as sincere in saying that, in my opinion, the pending legislation will not injure small business as others are in saying that it will. I want to say publicly—and I am now saying publicly—that if it is proved that I am wrong—and I do not believe I am—I shall join with them in proposing a measure to repeal this particular legislation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I wonder if the Senator would agree with me to this extent, that it really would not make much difference whether a seller were in good faith or not, especially if he was a large manufacturer, if he was making large discriminations in favor of large purchasers as against his small purchasers? I wonder if the Senator would agree with me that in situations similar to that existing in Detroit, in the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana case, in which small purchasers were discriminated against, even though the person doing the discriminating may be acting in good faith, it would not be possible for the many small-business people to survive in business for a long period of time.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the case, but I want to say again, as I did earlier in the day, that if the things the able Senator fears cannot be handled at the moment under our antitrust laws, if they cannot be handled under the pending legislation, then there is only one way they can be handled, and that is for Congress to pass a law which would force everyone to sell f. o. b. It seems to me that if the opponents of the pending legislation were in earnest about the matter they would introduce legislation which would force everyone to sell f. o. b. That is the only way we can ever be certain that from time to time there will not be conspiracies arising in this Nation. I believe we have sufficient laws to deal with conspiracies at the moment. I believe the bill we are now considering likewise deals with monopolistic conspiracies as effectively as does existing law. The reason I favor the pending legislation is that it clarifies certain situations.

THE COAL SITUATION

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, the special order of business which has been under discussion is of importance, but there is a matter of deeper concern to the people of our country, and which should really be a special order of business in the public interest. To that matter I wish to call the attention of the Senate at this time. I have received two telegrams this afternoon from my home State. I shall read them into the RECORD so the people of Ohio may know that the danger which threatens them is appreciated. The first telegram I shall read comes to me from T. W. Smith, Jr., general manager, Sun Rubber Co., Barberton, Ohio. It is as follows:

> Announcement by Duquesne Power & Light Co., Pittsburgh, that supplies to industrial consumers will be halted January 20 threatens us with shut-down due to lack of basic materials originating in Pittsburgh area. We urge immediate action making available adequate supplies of coal to permit continued industrial operations.

Mr. President, yesterday the press carried the story that the President of the United States had again said—and he has said it repeatedly in recent weeks and days—that there is no national emergency or crisis in the coal industry. A suit has been filed by Mr. Denham, and there is to be a hearing on the petition filed by him, as I understand, on the 26th of the month.

A resolution has been offered in the Senate declaring it to be the opinion of the Congress that the Taft-Hartley law should be used by the President of the United States and the strike or semistrike, or whatever it may be called, ended through that authority. It does not seem that otherwise there is any adequate relief for the public, for manufacturers throughout the country who are dependent upon an adequate and continuing supply of coal, or for the labor employed in those plants.

Another telegram I have received comes from Mr. C. B. Smythe, president of the Thew Shovel Co., at Lorain, Ohio. His telegram reads as follows:

> LORAIN, OHIO, January 19, 1950.
> The Honorable J. W. BRICKER,
> The United States Senate:
> Believe you should be informed that we are continuing plant operations at tremendous risk; our coal supply is less than 3 weeks whereas we should shut down with less than a 30-day supply. Any worsening of the situation will idle over 1,000 people.
> C. B. SMYTHE,
> President, Thew Shovel Co.

That telegram describes the situation at the small county city of Lorain, Ohio.

I have another telegram, coming from the city of Cleveland, Ohio, from the Ferry Enamel Corp. The telegram reads as follows:

> CLEVELAND, OHIO, January 18, 1950.
> Hon. J. W. BRICKER,
> Senate Office Building,
> Washington, D. C.:
> Operation of our plant, producing enamel, depends on the availability of zinc oxide. Due to lack of coal Duquesne Light & Power Co. of Pennsylvania are unable to furnish electric power to our zinc supplier, St. Joseph Lead Co. of Monaca, Pa. Lack of this electric power prohibits St. Joseph Lead Co. from furnishing zinc oxide. This will result in shut-down of our plant operations as well as shut-down of all our customers' plants who produce stoves, refrigerators, housing, washing machines, etc. May we ask for your intervention in this situation caused by lack of coal?
> FERRY ENAMEL CORP.

I have another telegram, from Cleveland, Ohio, from the Copperweld Steel Co., reading as follows:

> WARREN, OHIO, January 17, 1950.
> Senator JOHN W. BRICKER,
> Senate Office Building:
> Request action as provided in Taft-Hartley Act to relieve serious coal shortage occasioned by labor dispute in coal-mining industry. Industries at Pittsburgh must shut down Friday to conserve rapidly dwindling coal stocks for essential uses. Domestic consumers supply is also at low ebb and situation is extremely serious.
> COPPERWELD STEEL CO.,
> C. W. HOLMQUIST.

Another telegram comes from the city of Wadsworth, Ohio, from the Ohio Match Co. It reads as follows:

> WADSWORTH, OHIO, January 17, 1950.
> JOHN W. BRICKER,
> United States Senate,
> Washington, D. C.:
> We will be short of raw materials due to shut-off of power by the Duquesne Power & Light Co. to the St. Joseph Lead Co. due to coal shortage which will be effective January 20. Isn't there some way to give us relief from the coal shortage?
> THE OHIO MATCH CO.,
> DON WILLIAMS.

Another telegram comes from Bedford, Ohio, also in the eastern part of the State. It reads as follows:

> BEDFORD, OHIO, January 17, 1950.
> Senator JOHN BRICKER,
> Senate Building,
> Washington, D. C.:
> The Duquesne Power & Light Co. will cease operations January 20 due to coal shortage. This will affect the manufacture of zinc oxide at Josephtown, Pa., vital to our industry.
> THE STALWART RUBBER CO.,
> R. H. TYRRELL.

Another telegram comes from Dover, Ohio, from the Reeves Steel & Manufacturing Co.:

DOVER, OHIO, January 17, 1950.
Hon. JOHN W. BRICKER,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.:

St. Joseph Lead Co., on whom we depend for 25 tons of slab zinc per week to keep our galvanizing department in operation, has just wired us that Duquesne Power Co., which provides power for their electro thermic smelter, will cut off power this Friday on account of coal shortage, forcing them to close their Josephtown zinc plant and suspend shipments to us. Anything you can do to relieve the situation and keep our galvanizing department in operation will be much appreciated.

REEVES STEEL & MANUFACTURING CO.
A. J. KRANTZ,

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio whether he has received reports such as the one I hold in my hand, which I should like to read to him, from other sections of the country, as well.

I may say that this morning I have received both a letter and a telegram from the Governor of Maine expressing very serious concern; and there has just been handed me a telegram from the Commissioner of Agriculture of Maine, Mr. A. K. Gardner, saying that the coal situation affects not only the people but something more. I read the telegram:

Currently 2,000,000 chicks for broilers are being brooded in the central Maine area, mostly in Waldo County. Require 250 tons nut-size anthracite coal per week. Now receiving about 50 tons per week from regular suppliers. Reserve practically exhausted. Can you help the boys out? Prompt action necessary.

A. K. GARDNER,
Commissioner, Department of Agriculture.

That seems to support the position the Senator from Ohio is taking; and I understood the Senator referred to Mr. Denham's action.

Mr. BRICKER. I referred to that action earlier. In other words, a hearing is set on the question whether there shall be a restraining order or a temporary injunction. The hearing is set for the 26th day of this month.

Mr. BREWSTER. In the hearing before the Committee on Education and Labor, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], with his rather extensive knowledge of the Taft-Hartley Act, stated that it was very questionable whether any adequate relief could be secured by that procedure. It was very interesting—I do not know whether the junior Senator from Ohio is informed as to this—that the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], stated, at the conclusion of the hearing, that the committee were in agreement with the position taken by the Senator from Ohio as to the adequacy or inadequacy of relief which could be secured under the Denham proposal.

I think that should be taken into account by everyone concerned with possible action in this case.

Mr. BRICKER. In other words, we cannot rely upon having any adequate action taken by the court at the instance of Mr. Denham. There is not even confidence on the part of counsel himself as to the relief to be obtained even though the court grants the petition.

Mr. BREWSTER. I understood that to be the sentiment of the committee, as expressed by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. BRICKER. That seems to be the sentiment of the public articles I have read. No doubt the telegram the Senator from Maine has just read is characteristic of those which have been received by other Senators. I have received letters and telegrams, likewise, from many parts of the country. I have limited the ones I have read to those which have come from my home State.

I have another one, from Coldwater, Ohio, reading as follows:

COLDWATER, OHIO, January 18, 1950.
Hon. JOHN W. BRICKER,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

We are advised by our principal steel supplier that if coal stoppages in short workweek are not eliminated promptly they will be forced to start cutting operations next week. Within 2 weeks thereafter shipments may be cut as much as 50 percent. Other companies are in same condition. Since this division has been operating hand-to-mouth on steel for manufacture of farm equipment since the steel strike last fall any curtailment of shipments would have immediate drastic effect on employment at this plant employing 1,600 in Coldwater, Ohio, and 300 in Sandwich, Ill. Any loss in production now will seriously affect farmers this spring. Request vigorous action be taken to relieve this situation.

NEW IDEA DIVISION, AVCO MANUFACTURING CORP.,
E. C. CARMAN, Director of Purchases.

Other companies are in the same condition.

I have another telegram, from Akron, Ohio, from the Harwick Standard Chemical Co., Mr. R. L. Lasser, vice president. The telegram reads as follows:

AKRON, OHIO, January 17, 1950.
Senator JOHN W. BRICKER,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.:

Our business as distributors for many manufacturers of materials used in the rubber manufacturing industry put us in a position to evaluate the serious consequences which are developing from curtailed or discontinued production of basic items. We have been notified today of the necessity of discontinuing production of zinc oxide and synthetic resins in the Pittsburgh area because the Duquesne Power Co. does not have sufficient coal to operate industry after Friday of this week. These developments will necessitate shutting down rubber manufacturing plants, hundreds of them throughout the country, in a very short time. We believe a serious emergency is upon the rubber industry and urge that immediate steps be taken without further delay to get the coal mines in immediate production.

HARWICK STANDARD CHEMICAL CO.,
R. L. LASSER, Vice President.

I have another telegram, from Akron, Ohio, from Mr. E. A. Stevens, director of purchases of the B. F. Goodrich Co. Of course, the B. F. Goodrich Co. is one of the four great rubber companies of the United States, and employs thousands upon thousands of laborers, not only in our State, but throughout the country. Mr. Stevens says in his telegram:

AKRON, OHIO, January 17, 1950.
Senator JOHN W. BRICKER,
Senate Office Building:

Operations of B. F. Goodrich, Akron, Ohio, and Cadillac, Mich., plants and many other plants in rubber industry seriously threatened by shortage American-process, lead-free, zinc oxide arising from strikes in coal and zinc oxide industries. New Jersey zinc plant in Palmerton, Pa., has been on strike since September. Only other large source is St. Joseph Lead Co. plant at Josephtown, Pa. Duquesne Power & Light Co., Pittsburgh, has notified St. Joseph Lead that power will be completely cut off Friday, January 20, leaving practically no American-process zinc oxide for rubber and other industries. No substitute known. Coal and power shortages must be corrected quickly to avoid curtailment, unemployment, distress.

B. F. GOODRICH CO.,
E. A. STEVENS, Director of Purchases.

I have another telegram, from the General Tire & Rubber Co., also a company of extensive operations throughout the country. Their telegram reads as follows:

AKRON, OHIO, January 17, 1950.
Senator JOHN W. BRICKER,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Zinc oxide and zinc metal indispensable materials for rubber compounding in our industry. New Jersey Zinc Corp., largest suppliers, closed for 4 months account strike, therefore burden thrown on other suppliers, among which is St. Joseph Lead Refining Co., which is being closed by inability of Duquesne Light & Power Co. to furnish power, caused by coal shortage. If this condition continues tire production will be curtailed and men laid off. Ultimately this would affect truck transportation in shortage of truck tires. Urge you consider growing emergency.

THE GENERAL TIRE & RUBBER CO.

I have another telegram, from Akron, Ohio, reading as follows:

AKRON, OHIO, January 18, 1950.
Hon. JOHN W. BRICKER,
Senate Office Building:

Our company and other companies of the rubber industry obtain very vital basic materials for the manufacture of tires and other rubber products from the Pittsburgh district, which obtains its power from the Duquesne Power & Light Co. This company is curtailing power to all industrial users on January 20 because of the critical coal shortage. We hope that every possible action will be taken to restore normal coal production thus avoiding seriously crippling American industry with a resulting break-down of our national economy.

FIRESTONE TIRE & RUBBER CO.,
JOSEPH THOMAS, Secretary.

That telegram comes from Mr. Joseph Thomas, secretary of the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co.

I have another telegram, from Toledo, Ohio, reading as follows:

We have just been informed that Duquesne Power, Pittsburgh, will shut off power for industries in that region Friday night.

That is tonight, Mr. President.

I read further:

This affects us on high-grade zinc used at Cincinnati, Ohio, and Woodstock, Ill., and steel used in all of our plants. This will be exceedingly serious for us, and the repercussions on the automobile industry, our customer, will be great. It will throw several thousand men out of work.

That telegram is signed by D. H. Kelly, executive vice president of the Electric Autolite Co.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. I have heard from a great many communities in South Dakota, where there is now subzero weather, about the shortage of coal; and several of them have telegraphed me that they have only a 3-day supply of coal left.

Earlier in the Senator's remarks, he suggested that a court decision would be made in Washington on the 26th of January.

Mr. BRICKER. That is to be only an argument on the motion or demurrer.

Mr. MUNDT. That is correct.

Mr. BRICKER. I do not think we can be assured of a decision even at that time.

Mr. MUNDT. I agree completely. But even that is substantially more than 3 days away. I wonder whether the Senator could suggest a more immediate approach which might be made to alleviate this very serious Nation-wide condition.

Mr. BRICKER. The only approach that can be made at the present time—and the sole responsibility is his—is for the President of the United States to avail himself of the power and authority given him under the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Senator. I have so advised the citizens of South Dakota, and I am happy to have that opinion corroborated by so esteemed a source.

Mr. BRICKER. I thank the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. President, I have in my hand a letter from the A. F. Champney Coal Co., of Oberlin, Ohio, reading in part as follows:

> We wish to call your attention to the fact that the emergency is here. Our coal supply is practically exhausted and we are unable to get shipments because of the very short workweek at the mines. Without exaggerating, we feel that the situation is critical.

I have another letter which I received from the Merrill-Ranfft Co., of Toledo, Ohio, a merchandise brokerage company, one paragraph of which reads as follows:

> It seems very unusual to me that our miners should be forced to remain idle and our American consumers of coal be forced to import it from England.

Mr. Merrill encloses an article from the press, headlining the fact that the first British coal, since before the war, is on the way to Boston. I hope New England gets some relief through the medium of coal imported from England, but that is not going to relieve the great Central West, including my State. It is not going to relieve the miners who are thrown out of work. It is not going to relieve industry, which is utterly dependent upon American coal.

I have another letter, which comes from the Fahrland Fuel Co., Cleveland, Ohio, and which, in part, reads as follows:

> It is of the utmost importance that one of the first items on the agenda of the new session of Congress and the Senate is to end the ridiculous badger game being played by the mine owners, Washington officials, and the United Mine Workers of America.
> At present we have antitrust laws on our statutes to regulate large corporations—don't you think the same laws could apply to the large labor unions, they are also big business.
> In closing, please let me repeat, let us put aside any and all prejudices or any political beliefs we may have had in the past and use our best efforts to protect the health and welfare of the people. The coal industry is too large for any one individual to dictate as to when and how coal shall be mined.

I have another letter along the same line which comes from the Leonard Coal & Supply Co., of Dayton, Ohio. The company says it is almost out of coal, and definitely emphasizes that there is an emergency in Dayton, Ohio.

I have another letter from the Reid Coal Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, likewise emphasizing the emergency which is today prevalent throughout that great industrial center, and which is not only distressing industry and business, but actually threatening the peace and health and safety and welfare of the people of that great industrial city.

I have another letter which comes from the Majestic Coal Co., of Columbus, Ohio, my home city. Last week I was called at home by several coal operators who said they were practically out of coal, and that they were having to ration, among people who actually needed it for the heating of their homes, the small amount of coal they had in their bins, and which they could supply. The letter reads as follows:

> The coal supply problem is not a local or State issue. It is a Nation-wide issue that can be settled only on a national basis. Therefore, we ask that you enforce the Taft-Hartley law, so the mines will be running on a 5-day-a-week schedule.

There is nothing that an individual Senator can do except bring to the attention of his colleagues and the American public the critical situation which prevails everywhere because of the shortage of fuel not only for industrial needs but for home heating as well.

But there is something that can be done by the President of the United States.

I hope the Senate and the Congress will immediately proceed to consider the resolution now pending before this body, sensing the importance and the danger of the situation throughout the country, and that we shall at least express our feeling to the President of the United States, whose sole responsibility it is under the law today.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator, is it not true that a great number of the domestic consumers of coal buy in very small quantities and depend entirely on the stock piles of coal dealers?

Mr. BRICKER. That is entirely true. I know those who even buy in bushel baskets, as well as in half-ton lots and in ton lots. Very few of the homes in my city are supplied with much more than 1 or 2 tons of coal at a time. They, as well as the dealers in coal, are at this time caught in short supply. I know many of our friends are in a very critical situation by reason of the shortage in the supply of coal, and if they did not have oil or gas as an auxiliary heat, their homes would actually be cold today.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, will the the Senator yield further?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN. Is it not also true that of the new homes now being erected, at least nine-tenths of them are being provided with fuel-oil or gas-heating appliances and are eliminating coal, because of the difficulty and uncertainty of securing a coal supply?

Mr. BRICKER. There can be no question that the Senator from Pennsylvania is correct. I had the figures a short time ago from the Public Utilities Commission of Ohio. As I remember, they have this year authorized approximately 100,000 installations of gas-heating equipment in our State alone. The figure is entirely from memory, but I know I was startled at the size of it. Not only are 100,000 new houses using gas for heating, but today, tomorrow, and for all time to come, the great bituminous coal industry, in which the Senator's State is vitally interested, is being deprived of a permanent market.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN. Referring to the coal mines which in Pennsylvania we call "wagon mines," are they still operating in Ohio, or have they been closed down by reason of the pickets?

Mr. BRICKER. Some of them have been closed down. A few of them are operating. I think we had one or two perhaps that entered into a contract. I am not sure about that, but most of them are shut down. There is no adequate supply from the open-surface mines or from the strip mines.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senator will permit, I should merely like to make an observation, because I feel that this is one of the most serious crises that has ever confronted our section of the United States. Last Friday, Saturday, and Sunday morning, I started out to look over the situation so as to obtain personal knowledge. During the week end, ordinarily one will see trainloads of coal ready to move the first of the following week. I did not observe a single car of coal on the siding. I then went to the stock piles of the great steel corporations and utilities, which ordinarily keep a 90-day supply of coal on hand. There is practically no coal there. There is no coal for the man, mentioned by the Senator, who buys a bushel at a time, or possibly a half a ton at a time. The situation is serious. Within the past 2 weeks, one of the great veterans' hospitals had to go to a coal broker to ask on two occasions, as an emergency, that it be furnished 1,000 tons of coal in order to keep the veterans who are in the hospital from becoming cold. It is most fortunate that we have had but little cold weather during this winter. If it starts to get cold, I am afraid there will be terrible suffering and probably disease as a result. I repeat, the situation is serious, and I thank the Senator for bringing the matter to our attention.

Mr. BRICKER. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania. There not only will be suffering, there actually has been suffering in the United States as a result of the coal shortage.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. Under a provision of the law of the land, the Taft-Hartley Act, whenever the President finds that a national emergency exists, as I think the Senator has already brought out, he has the power to act and to correct the situation. Is that not correct?

Mr. BRICKER. He is given authority under the law to resort to the courts and obtain an injunction for an 80-day period, during which the strike is enjoined.

Mr. MUNDT. He is authorized to look around and to determine whether there is a national emergency. Then, too, other governmental agencies having findings on the same subject should have some influence on the White House. The Interstate Commerce Commission has issued a public statement that we are now in a national emergency. Because we are in a national emergency, it is exercising its authority to curtail the movement of trains drawn by coal-burning locomotives. It would seem consequently that the President has access to a rather clear-cut definition of a national emergency by one of our governmental agencies which has charge of the transportation network. I wonder whether the Senator from Ohio shares with me the feeling that in the debate now taking place among the executive agencies as to whether there is a national emergency or not, the Interstate Commerce Commission has clearly the better of it, in view of the facts which have been spread in the RECORD of what is taking place in all the States of the Union.

Mr. BRICKER. The Interstate Commerce Commission is the body best qualified I think both to observe, through its constant contact with railroads and schedules, the need of coal and the distribution of coal throughout the country. At first there was an allocation or a priority right given to the rails for the purpose of their utilization of coal. Later on, the Interstate Commerce Commission I think, as a temporary measure, permitted the railroads to take off a portion of their trains—I think it reached about 25 percent of their passenger transportation trains—in order to lessen the demand for coal.

I may say to the Senator from South Dakota, referring to what the Senator from Pennsylvania said as to the future market being taken away from the coal industry, which is important in his State and in mine, the railroads are as rapidly as possible changing to Diesel locomotive or to fuel oil of some kind, in order to get away from the constant harassment they have suffered in recent years, due to the intermittent strikes, and finally, the strike which is on at the present time, of a 3-day-workweek character, which has further imperiled their ability to carry on their transportation service in an adequate fashion.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. I can well appreciate why railroads are switching from coal-burning locomotives to Diesel locomotives. In South Dakota a predominant number of trains are drawn by coal-burning locomotives, and we find ourselves in this hopelessly vicious cycle, because the Interstate Commerce Commission has declared that a national emergency exists and has asked the railroads to reduce the amount of transportation they provide by coal-burning locomotives. We find it increasingly difficult to have coal delivered to the areas in South Dakota in which the weather is the coldest. So, because the Interstate Commerce Commission says a national emergency exists, at a time when the President says there is no cause for alarm and that no emergency exists, we find the situation is made more hopeless because of confusion existing among executive departments.

Mr. BRICKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, no one could receive the letters I have received without realizing that there is a critical situation which is dangerous to the public health and safety of the Nation.

Mr. President, I have in my hand another letter from the town of Versailles, Ohio, from the George H. Worch Lumber Co., Inc., saying, among other things:

> Normally at this time of the year, we have in the neighborhood of 1,000 tons of coal on hand to meet our winter demand. At the present time we have 120 tons of fuel and would not be able to meet any severe demands for fuel on the basis of our receipts at present.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I shall be happy to yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, the able junior Senator from Ohio is discussing a question which is vital to the Northwestern section of the United States. I have received many telegrams and telephone communications advising me of the situation existing among the manufacturers of our cities, who are constantly confronted with canceled orders because the merchandise could not be shipped to them by reason of the shortage of coal which has compelled them to close their plants from which manufacturers had been getting some of their raw materials. After having received telephone calls, telegrams, and letters on the subject, night before last, in the evening hours of my office day, I felt the urgency of the situation was so great that I should telegraph the President and state to him frankly what the situation was in my State. I sent a telegram to the President, calling to his attention the emergency with which we are confronted. The temperature at the time in my State was below 40 degrees. Plants were laying off anywhere from 100 to several thousand employees a day because they could not get the raw materials to continue in operation.

So I say that the junior Senator from Ohio is discussing a subject which needs to be discussed. The situation is certainly working a hardship on many of our manufacturers and the people of the State of Minnesota.

Mr. BRICKER. I thank the Senator from Minnesota. I might say that his State is in even greater peril than is the State of Ohio. In Ohio we have some wagon mines and strip mines from which coal is available, but it would be very difficult, with lake cargo traffic closed, to get coal into the great Northwest.

Mr. President, I have a letter from the Carl A. Abe Coal Co., of Waupakoneta, Ohio, in the western part of the State, from which letter I shall read one paragraph:

> All we hear is "No emergency," but if zero weather would hit overnight, within 48 hours I doubt if 10 percent of the dealers in Ohio would have any coal of any kind or size in their yards.

I think, Mr. President, that condition prevails in other sections of the country to an even greater extent than in my State.

I have a letter from Homer C. Gill Coals, Inc. The letter says:

> Since our last meeting, conditions have changed in our area to an alarming state—not only with us but with all coal merchants.
> We note that Senator SCOTT LUCAS is endeavoring to get President Truman to do something to relieve the coal situation. We trust you will throw all the weight that is humanly possible on this matter because we are absolutely going to be too destitute to take care of a part of our regular demand for domestic coal. This relates to stoker coal.
> We hate to write you and burden you with our troubles, but we are needing help now.

Mr. President, I have a telegram from Hamilton, Ohio, signed by approximately a dozen persons, saying:

> Shortage of domestic coal for our homes is very acute here. A calamity can be avoided only by promptly restoring full production at the mines.

I have another telegram from Hamilton, Ohio, containing approximately two and a half pages of signatures of home owners in the State of Ohio, and saying:

> Would appreciate any effort on your part to ease the critical coal shortage in our community.

Those letters and telegrams, Mr. President, come from every section of my State. They could be multiplied to cover every section of the United States. A critical and dire situation prevails. I doubt very much the efficacy of the action brought by Mr. Denham. Even if he is successful, there will be intolerable delay to the people of the country in getting adequate court action to bring about the relief so sorely needed at the present time and which has been needed for many weeks.

I do not know the considerations in the mind of the President when he says there is no emergency. I do not know the information upon which he arrives at that conclusion. He certainly has not talked to the people of the country. Certainly he is insulated from the actual truth of the situation, or he could not possibly come to that conclusion. I hope no political consideration has led him in making his decision. I hope he is not controlled by those who are so opposed to the Taft-Hartley law that they do not want him to avail himself of it so that the American people may see the benefit of that law which he has criticized so viciously throughout the country.

Mr. President, a crisis is present. There is only one person in the United States who can relieve it. He sits in the highest seat of authority in the land—the President of the United States.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I wish to compliment the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] for his courageous statement this afternoon. I just arrived in Washington this morning from Wisconsin, and while we in Wisconsin are also geographically pretty well situated, we find that not only are plants being interfered with, so far as jobs no longer being in existence is concerned, but we find also that the cold weather has struck. In my section the thermometer went down to about 20 below zero. I was in Milwaukee when it was 5 below.

Mr. President, the present condition not only means that there will be suffering, but there will be a drop in national income. If our Government is to continue spending, there must be an income base in the Nation to tax.

I had to smile a little when the distinguished Senator from Ohio was telling about the income from coal in Ohio and Pennsylvania being destroyed because of the inactivity of the President. There are many ways by which income can be reduced. A few days ago the Senate hit my State when it got mixed up in the oleo-butter controversy. What the impact on the income of my State will be the Lord only knows, unless, as I said, American ingenuity comes into play, chemistry comes into play, and outlets are found for the billions of pounds of milk which will be seeking a market.

By legislation which might be characterized by some as the foolish act of the legislative branch, and by the inaction of the Executive, wealth can be dissipated, unemployment increased, and taxes diminished. As I stated a few days ago, the time for thinkers has come.

I desired to say, in relation to the matter of the failure of the President to act, that I was speaking yesterday with a number of businessmen in Milwaukee, who took the position that Congress itself was in a position to handle the situation. That indicates what seems to me to be an utter lack of knowledge of the way our Government is constituted. There are functions which are legislative which we in the Congress can perform. There are functions which are executive, such as those the President now refuses to perform, and which he should perform as the executive or administrative branch of the Government. It is his function to administer the law. The law is on the statute books. As I said to some of those with whom I was talking, "I am merely a legislator. We have legislated the law. We have created the necessary machinery." Yet they looked blankly at me as if I had failed in my function.

Mr. President, I say that in this great Nation, with its 150,000,000 people, it is time we went back to the Constitution and understood that this was created a Government of divided functions. I say again that in my humble opinion the President of the United States is poorly advised, because if the present cold snap in the Middle West should continue, there would be untold suffering.

I got off the train in Chicago expecting to catch another train for Milwaukee, and found that the train had been taken off. Of course, the inconvenience was one of only 2 or 3 hours, but when I got on the train and started to talk to the trainmen, I found that the President is not making votes by what he is doing. A good many of the trainmen have been pretty good Democrats, but they are becoming fed up. Thousands of them are being thrown out of work. Perhaps as a Republican I should rather say, "Carry on with your foolishness," but that is not the way I feel. I feel that there is a tremendous threat to our economic health, moral health, and sane thinking.

As I left Chicago I particularly noticed the coal yards, scraped clean. In my own city and State the supply of coal is being depleted. When the temperature reaches 15 or 20 degrees below zero, then cold weather is upon us.

Mr. President, for the good of the Nation, for its economic health, for the good of the jobless, more and more of whom at this time are asking assistance, and for the sake of better understanding between man and man, I hope the President will perform now the function which we have asked him to carry out in a resolution which has been entered. What if he did make a mistake of a week or two, and there were not an emergency until 2 weeks from now? Is he not supposed to be a man looking after the welfare of the whole people?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. WATKINS. Is the Senator from Wisconsin advised as to the situation in the Rocky Mountain region of the West with respect to the coal supply?

Mr. WILEY. Not in detail, but I heard a comment about that on the train as I came to Washington. A gentleman from Colorado on the train told me that the situation there was very serious. Today I attended a meeting where the matter was discussed. I understand the situation is serious.

Mr. WATKINS. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that in a recent report from Utah, which is a large coal-producing State, it was stated that the production is less than 50 percent of what it was a year ago, when we had a severe winter, and now we are having another severe winter there. Possibly there is a 3 days' supply on hand in most of the distributing centers.

The State of Utah supplies coal for seven of the Intermountain or Western States. Most of the supply comes from Utah, and the miners are working only 3 days a week. In ordinary years it takes full production of 6 days a week to take care of the needs of the intermountain area so far as coal supply is concerned.

Under present conditions, as I have been advised within the last 24 hours, there is on hand only a 3 days' supply. It takes 10 days to get coal from the mines to the distributors. By that time, I think the Senator will realize, we will be facing an emergency in the Intermountain States.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the Senator. I wish to conclude this thought by saying that I trust that when the newspapermen comment on this matter it will be made clear to the public that the legislative branch is not failing the country. I suppose some think that we as legislators can legislate coal into being. One of the cock-eyed notions which has been in evidence for the past 15 or 20 years is that economic, moral, and political ills can be cured by legislation. It takes something else. It takes action, and that action, when it relates to political matters, requires wisdom, when it relates to economic matters it requires wisdom, and when it relates to moral matters it also requires the wisdom of an individual. Mere legislative enactments will not accomplish the purpose. They cannot make John Jones, a crook, into a clean man. So I trust that the country will understand that the failure to get jobs back, to get the railroads running, to get the mines in operation, is due entirely to the inaction of the Executive.

REMOVAL OF RESTRICTIONS FROM LAND-GRANT COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I am joining today with several other Senators in introducing a bill which seeks to relieve the land-grant colleges and universities from onerous restrictions which have been placed on them by the Veterans' Administration.

The Senators who are joining me in the introduction of this bill are the following:

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], the Senators from Oregon [Mr. CORDON and Mr. MORSE], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL].

I hope that the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] will also join, because he signified his great interest in this bill. He is away today, and I cannot reach him by telephone.

The bill (S. 2909) to amend Veterans Regulation No. 1 (a) with respect to the computation of estimated costs of teaching personnel and supplies for instruction in the case of colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts and other nonprofit educational institutions, introduced by Mr. TOBEY (for himself, Mr. HILL, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. TAFT, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. CORDON, Mr. MORSE, Mr. MUNDT, Mr. HUMPHREY, and Mr. SCHOEPPEL), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, it is my sincere belief that unless Congress acts upon this bill or a similar bill, a fundamental educational principle will have been seriously threatened by arbitrary administrative action.

In October of 1949 the president of the University of New Hampshire, Dr. Arthur S. Adams, was elected president of the Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities. Working with his executive committee, he has placed the problem which faces his association before me. For well over a year the land-grant colleges have been seeking an administrative remedy from the Veterans' Administration, so this is no Johnny-come-lately proposition.

The Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended, sets up certain standards by which the Veterans' Administrator shall carry out the intent of Congress in administering veterans' educational benefits. In particular reference to the problem at hand, section 5 (d), as amended, reads, in part, as follows:

> That any institution may apply to the Administrator for adjustment of tuition, and the Administrator, if he finds that the customary tuition charges are insufficient to permit the institution to furnish education or training to eligible veterans, or inadequate compensation therefor, may provide for the payment of such fair and reasonable compensation as will not exceed the estimated cost of teaching personnel and supplies for instruction.

As I explain in full in the statement which I am going to insert as a part of my remarks, Congress specifically rejected, in 1945, the authority for the Administrator to deduct certain funds which are customarily received by the colleges from the "fair and reasonable" compensation which he must supply to such colleges when they meet certain standards.

When Dr. Adams laid his problem before me late in December, I was very shocked to find that the Administrator, buttressed by his Solicitor's opinion, had taken into his own hands the authority which Congress had previously specifically rejected. By administrative regulation, he now requires the deduction of certain Morrill Act funds from the grants for tuition which he gives to each college for a veteran's education.

I submit, Mr. President, without any fear of successful contradiction, that this is directly contrary to the intent of Congress when it passed and amended the Servicemen's Readjustment Act. This is not all. Even beyond the specific deduction of Morrill Act funds which he now requires, contrary to the intent of the law, he has specifically reserved the right to act further by administrative regulation in requiring deduction of other funds, even beyond Federal funds.

Let me read to you from Administrator's decision, No. 812, dated April 22, 1949:

> It is at once apparent from the foregoing that what might be a fair and reasonable rate for one institution for such purposes might not be for another. For instance, if an institution has large endowments or other adequate funds, whether provided by public or private sources or from earnings of the institution itself, it may not be said to need any material additional amount of compensation over and above the customary charges in order to permit it to furnish education or training to veterans, and while the institution might well argue that the other alternative should be applied to it, that is, that it should be adequately paid for such education or training courses, the argument loses much of its weight when measured against the element of actual need.

Conscientious and sincere educators the country over are vastly perturbed lest this decision throws the door wide open to much greater Federal interference in their educational policies.

Speaking for myself and the cosponsors of this legislation, I cannot conceive that any such capricious and arbitrary wording as that found in the Administrator's decision can be allowed to stand. My examination of the legislative history of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act leaves absolutely no doubt in my mind that there is no power, implied or otherwise, for the Veterans' Administrator to require the deduction of normal educational funds, whether Federal or otherwise, and if the present administrative regulation in relation to Morrill Act funds is not bad enough, the assumption of the power to deduct other funds from public or private sources is intolerable.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to submit certain other material as exhibits as a part of my remarks at this time. I particularly call the attention of all Senators to the whole of the Administrator's decision No. 812, which, in my opinion, is as skillful a job of legal rationalization to get around the intent of Congress as I have ever seen.

I now offer for the RECORD at this point these exhibits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXHIBIT I

STATEMENT CONCERNING FISCAL RELATIONSHIPS BETWEEN LAND-GRANT COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES AND THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION IN CONNECTION WITH THE VETERANS' EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM

1. BACKGROUND

The integrity and proper use of certain funds granted to land-grant colleges and universities by the Congress under acts long antedating World War II have been gravely endangered by actions of the Veterans' Administration in connection with the veterans education program. The 53 member institutions of the Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities, which, as a group, enroll more than a quarter of all the college students in the Nation, are greatly aroused by this state of affairs.

I believe that the action of the Veterans' Administration has grave implications for the relationships of the Federal Government with all of education. We feel that a fundamental principle is involved. In my conviction that the Veterans' Administration is wrong in principle I am supported by the American Council on Education (which represents all types of institutions, public and private), by the National Association of State Universities, by the Department of Higher Education, National Education Association, and by the Advisory Committee to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

The history of this controversy is complex. The issue is simple. The issue is whether the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, exercising powers expressly rejected by the Congress when requested by VA, shall nevertheless so interpret them as to permit the conversion of funds coming to educational institutions for other purposes than the veterans program. The Solicitor of the Veterans' Administration has ruled this is within the legal powers of the Administrator.

Since wide discretion is given the Administrator under the law to administer a complex program, and there is no provision for recourse to the courts, it is difficult to establish the legality of an action of the Administrator. The case of the land-grant colleges and universities is, however, not based on this point. It is my contention that the position of the Administrator is unsound, arbitrary, in violation of the intent of Congress, and a grave threat to confidence of educational institutions in the integrity of the Federal Government as represented by VA, in its dealings with them.

The history of the controversy is this:

In the passage of Public Law 268, Seventy-ninth Congress, first session, the Congress provided that for public institutions whose customary tuition charges were insufficient or inadequate compensation to carry on the veterans' educational program, the Administrator might contract to pay on a fair and reasonable basis for such education, but not to exceed the estimated cost of teaching personnel and supplies.

The Veterans' Administration had asked the Congress for authority to include in its estimation of the amount of compensation which should be paid, the amount of private or public funds available to educational institutions (from other sources than VA).

The Seventy-ninth Congress expressly rejected this proposal when it upheld its conference committee on H. R. 3749 and turned down authority for the Administrator to readjust payments in consideration of increased or decreased enrollment and available contributions to meet such costs whether from public or private funds.

This action, therefore, empowered the Administrator to pay public institutions, for the education of veterans, an amount not to exceed the estimated cost of teaching personnel and supplies. In testimony on this bill before the Senate, Mr. E. E. Odom, solicitor of the Veterans' Administration, said "What we propose to do is pay the cost of teaching personnel and supplies. That is determinable * * *."

Subsequently, the Veterans' Administration issued regulations as to how institutions should proceed in determining their cost of teaching personnel and supplies. These regulations provided, essentially, that institutions should determine their teaching costs by adding up salaries paid teachers. These were to be divided by the number of credit-hours taught by these teachers, and a rate per credit-hour arrived at. This rate would then be paid for all the credit-hours taken by veteran students. Since the formula above does not cover any of the cost of teaching assistants, classroom supplies, and the like, a flat percentage to cover these items is added to the figure arrived at. The Veterans' Administration also pays certain nontuition fees regularly required of all students (as it does with institutions on a customary tuition basis).

Although the formula given above has obvious inadequacies in that it excludes many of the real costs of teaching, it had the merit within its limitations of being simple and fairly easy to arrive at. There was no thought at the time that the Veterans' Administration would take the position of requiring that certain teaching expenditures be eliminated in estimating the cost of teaching.

Subsequently the Veterans' Administration issued regulations which said in essence that where Federal funds (from other than VA sources) were available to institutions, due consideration would be given these funds in determining teaching costs. The only funds specifically mentioned were Smith-Hughes funds for vocational agriculture teacher-training and teaching.

Some land-grant institutions interpreted this regulation to mean that funds received by land-grant institutions for further endowment under the Morrill, Morrill-Nelson, and Bankhead-Jones Acts (passed in 1890, 1907, and 1935) were to be deducted from teaching costs on the cost side of the ledger while credit-hours taught for these funds should be included on the other side of the ledger. This interpretation, which was that given to the regulation by the contract office of the Veterans' Administration, involved introduction of the principles rejected by the Congress in 1945 that funds from other than VA sources might be taken into account in determining the amount of compensation. Many institutions did not make this interpretation of VA regulations, and did not deduct these funds. Many institutions protested individually, to VA regional and other offices. There was no organized protest at the time because college presidents generally found their time and energies taxed to the limit in getting facilities expanded to take care of veterans.

Late in 1948, audits by the General Accounting Office were used as the basis for claims by the Veterans' Administration against institutions which had not deducted Federal land-grant teaching funds in estimating their teaching costs.

On February 13, 1949, a joint committee of the National Association of State Universities and the Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities met with the Advisory Committee to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and formally protested, among other things, the Veterans' Administration's interpretation of its regulations to require deduction of Federal endowment funds of land-grant institutions from their teaching costs. While there was no formal notification of the action of the Advisory Committee, it is understood that at that time the Advisory Committee recommended to the Administrator that he not require such a deduction.

On April 22, 1949, 3¼ years after the passage of Public Law 268, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for the first time issued a decision that this deduction requirement was legal. The Solicitor's opinion (812) accompanying this decision based the legality of this requirement on the power (which he also pointed out was expressly rejected by the Congress) of the Administrator to require that the availability of any funds from any source to an institution (private endowment, State funds or Federal funds) be taken into consideration by the Administrator in determining payments on behalf of the veterans program. The theory of this decision is, apparently, that it is not necessarily the responsibility of the Administrator to pay an institution for the cost, or any portion of the cost of the veterans program beyond customary fees if the institution can keep its doors open otherwise. This contrasts with the views of Gen. Omar N. Bradley, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs at the time of passage of Public Law 268, who said "It was assumed originally that the States would meet their normal program and that the Federal Government should meet any additional cost by reason of the educational provisions of the Readjustment Act."

On June 8, 1949, representatives of the Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities and the National Association of State Universities met with the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and his Advisory Committee, and again objected to the VA requirement on deduction of Federal funds. At this time it is known that the Advisory Committee did specifically recommend to the Administrator that he change his decision on Federal funds effective July 1, 1949.

On July 15, 1949, General Gray told the chairman of his advisory committee that he would not change his decision.

On October 13, 1949, a committee again met with General Gray, this time without the presence of his advisory committee.

General Gray promised to reconsider his decision, and to give an answer before October 27, the date of the annual meeting of the Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities. No answer was given. Telegraphic communication with General Gray brought the response that he had again referred the matter to his advisory committee.

On November 13, 1949, a joint committee met for the fourth time in a year to discuss this matter, this time with the advisory committee. The advisory committee again (presumably for the third time) recommended to General Gray (1) that he change his decision and also (2) that he find means of reimbursing those institutions which had deducted Federal funds in figuring their teaching costs.

On December 12, 1949, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs notified the president of the Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities, and the heads of each institution, that he had reached a final decision not to alter the regulation in question administratively, though he expressed willingness to submit the question to the Congress.

2. WHAT ARE THE FEDERAL FUNDS AT ISSUE?

The Federal funds at issue between the land-grant institutions and the Veterans' Administration come from a series of Federal acts.

1. The first, or original Morrill Land-Grant Act of 1862, is not presently in controversy, but its nature is part of the essential background. The original Land-Grant Act offered grants of land to each State and Territory to be sold and the money used as a perpetual endowment for institutions which would stress agriculture and the mechanic arts and provide education for the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions of life. Veterans' Administration has not asked that the income from these endowments be deducted, although decision 812 certainly states the view that the Administrator has power to require their deduction.

2. In 1890, the Congress passed the Second Morrill Act, which was for the more complete endowment and maintenance of land-grant institutions, through annual appropriations, to be used for instruction or facilities for instruction.

3. In 1907, the 1890 act was amended by the Nelson amendment, also for the more complete endowment and maintenance of land-grant institutions and for the same purposes as the 1890 act.

4. In 1935, section 2 of the Bankhead-Jones Act of that year provided additional funds for the more complete endowment and support of land-grant institutions, through annual appropriation.

Some of these grants are on the basis of so much per State, some on the basis of population, adjusted, as relative populations rise or fall.

All of these annual appropriations are for the further endowment of the institutions established under the 1862 act. All the acts were passed long before World War II and the passage in 1944 of Public Law 346. None of the appropriations under these acts have been increased since World War II. All were part of the normal instructional or other budget of the institutions prior to World War II, just as were State appropriations and private endowment funds.

3. SUPPORTING POINTS

The following points are cited in support of the contention that the deduction of these funds should not be required:

1. The Morrill-Nelson and Bankhead-Jones funds were all appropriated for the further endowment of land-grant institutions, and therefore have an endowment character, even though appropriated annually for instruction and instructional facilities.

2. These funds were part of the normal instructional budget of the institutions prior to the passage of Public Law 346. They have not been increased since that time. They were therefore part of the normal program of all the institutions involved, and should not be deducted under the theory of Federal payment for costs beyond a normal program, which is the minimum theory that can be found in the pertinent history of the acts.

3. While the Administrator has asserted the power to require deduction of any type of funds available to the institution, he has in practice not yet attempted to require deduction of State funds, private endowments, or private gifts. The endowment character of the funds in question places them in the same essential status as private endowments. It is also believed that just as private endowments may become State funds when used by public institutions in accordance with the wishes of the donee, so also do Federal endowment funds.

4. The Comptroller General has held (2 CG 684, and in other citations not immediately available) that the responsibility of the State with respect to Federal-grant funds is to see that these funds are expended in accordance with the purposes for which appropriated by the Federal Government, and that as long as this responsibility is discharged the Federal Government may not control the handling of the funds. They become State funds, not in an unlimited sense, but in every sense except the requirement of accounting to the Federal Government for their expenditures for the intended purpose.

The land-grant funds in question have been expended for the purpose covered in the Morrill-Nelson and Bankhead-Jones Acts. The institutions were performing before the war and are still performing the services required. The funds have not been increased by virtue of Public Law 346 or any act of Congress since 1945. Question: Is there then, any basis for requiring deduction of these funds as Federal when they are in effect State funds? Further question: Public Law 346 originally and as amended contains a specific provision against any department, agency, or officer of the United States, in carrying out the provisions of this part, exercising any supervision or control whatsoever over any State educational agency, or any educational or training institutions. Is the requirement of deduction of certain funds in estimating teaching costs an exercise of control over a State educational agency or educational institution, particularly under the theory that these are State funds?

NOTE.—VA holds that income from the original Morrill Act is a State and not a Federal fund. All subsequent acts in question are amendments to the original act.

5. The statute provides that the Administrator may provide for payment of such fair and reasonable compensation as will not exceed the estimated cost of teaching personnel and supplies of instruction. The wording and the history of the act indicate clearly that the word "cost" means cost without regard to the source of funds from which these costs are paid. It is impossible to estimate cost without estimating all elements of cost.

6. The above (par. 5) also covers the VA contention that if Federal endowment funds were not deducted in estimating costs, duplicate payment would result. No duplicate payment whatever is involved. These contracts are not reimbursement contracts. They are agreements to pay a credit-hour rate for veterans' instruction on the basis of estimated credit-hour costs of all instruction. This is the only payment made for this purpose. The cost formula should be a method of arriving at costs, not a method of excluding a portion of the costs. Duplication does not enter.

7. As stated above, the formula of Public Law 268 threw on public institutions with low fees most of the essential costs of instruction except those of teaching personnel and supplies. VA proposes to throw still additional costs on them by eliminating a portion of their costs from their cost calculations. There is no indication that this was contemplated by the Congress, which rejected the above suggestion of VA.

8. Nowhere in the VA manuals or regulations are Federal grants to land-grant institutions specifically mentioned by name. The only funds mentioned are Smith-Hughes, George-Dean, and other matching State-Federal funds. These are not Smith-Hughes, George-Dean, or matching State-Federal funds, indicating a distinction in the minds of VA personnel. It is not strange that institutions made the same distinction.

9. The fact that many land-grant institutions have prepared their teaching cost data and budgets on their own bona fide construction of the statute and regulations creates in and of itself, a situation which merits serious consideration.

10. The broad powers claimed as legal justification for the requirement of deduction of Federal funds afford a precedent for a similar claim by other Federal agencies that their respective commitments to pay reasonable compensation for various services to be received, could be reduced by the conversion or partial conversion of funds appropriated or donated for other purposes than those covered by the contract. The setting of such a precedent, and the exercise of such power, would mark a development in the relationship of the Federal Government to the States and to educational institutions generally which can be viewed only with the gravest apprehension.

11. The endowment character of these funds, as plainly indicated in all the acts of Congress, is again stressed as a basis for their protection from encroachment, when used by the institution for the purposes indicated by the Congress.

4. OTHER POINTS

Many other points have been raised between the Veterans' Administration and educational institutions, both public and private.

The public institutions have been particularly harassed in the operation of the veterans' program, because they are the only nonprofit institutions which have, because of their normal low fees, been under the necessity of operating under contracts with the Veterans' Administration, which contracts are subject to subsequent interpretation on a one-sided basis by the Veterans' Administration, and whose accounts are subject to audit by the General Accounting Office. Veterans' Administration is in a position to, and has repeatedly, canceled signed contracts on the basis that provisions of them were illegal, although holding that the institutions do not have a similar right to pass on legality or recover underpayments due to misinterpretation of regulations by representatives of the VA. The combination of General Accounting Office accountants who are not informed about educational procedures and VA decisions has caused interference with educational institutions to a degree certainly not anticipated by the Congress under its explicit directive against such interference in Public Law 346, or by the educational institutions themselves.

None of these matters is quite as alarming, however, as the position taken by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and his legal staff that they may, at their discretion, so construe the law and the intent of Congress as to require the conversion of endowment funds long part of the normal instructional budget of public educational institutions.

Mr. TOBEY. And so, Mr. President, I respectfully ask the aid of the Senate in taking such steps as will, first, forbid the Administrator from requiring the elimination of Federal further endowment funds from acts prior to World War II in estimating cost of teaching personnel and supplies by land-grant institutions; second, prohibit the Administrator from reserving the power as he did in Administrator's decision No. 812, to require reduction of payments to such institutions by reason of payments from State, municipal, or other non-Federal public funds, or from private endowments or gifts; and third, make it possible for the Veterans' Administration to refund to those institutions which did make this deduction the full amount of the deduction retroactively.

DECEMBER 12, 1949.

Mr. ARTHUR ADAMS,
President, Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ADAMS: As promised in the several conferences with representatives of the land-grant colleges and other educational institutions, which conferences were held several times since last June, I have given the most careful, even prayerful, consideration to the question whether there should be eliminated from the Veterans' Administration regulations the requirement that certain Federal funds be taken into consideration in establishing a fair and reasonable rate of tuition for the education of veterans by such institutions. After such consideration of all representations which have been made, and in the light of the legal and other aspects of the matter, I have reached the conclusion that the regulation does result in fair and reasonable rates within the intent of the statute and that it will not be modified in this respect. The association representatives were informed at the June conference that it could not be legally changed retroactively.

It may be appropriate to state briefly the grounds upon which my decision is founded, inasmuch as your organization requested that the entire matter be presented to the Congress, and I agreed to forward to the Congress any material you send me with a request that it be submitted to the Congress.

The basic question, of course, is whether the regulation is valid. It was issued in January 1946 by the then Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. The statutory basis for the regulation is paragraph 5, part VIII, Veterans Regulation 1 (a); title II, Servicemen's Readjustment Act, Public Law 346, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended by Public Law 268, Seventy-ninth Congress, act of December 28, 1945; as construed by Administrator's Decisions 580, August 24, 1944; No. 720, September 20, 1946; No. 812, April 22, 1949; and No. 820, August 8, 1949. (Incidentally, the decisions of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs on any question of law or fact are final and not reviewable by any other governmental official or court (38 U. S. C. 705), and the regulations issued by him are not reviewable.) (See Opinion of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia in Metropolitan Training Center, Inc., v. Gray; Opinion of the United States District Court for the District of Maryland in New York Technical Institute v. Limburg, et al., November 30, 1949; and Decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in Slocumb v. Gray, decided December 5, 1949, citation not yet available.)

The said paragraph 5 authorized the Administrator to pay the customary cost of tuition and fees but it provides an alternative authority whereby the Administrator is authorized, upon application by any institution, to establish a fair and reasonable rate of tuition in lieu of the customary tuition if he find that the customary tuition charges are insufficient or inadequate compensation for the education or training of veterans. It restricts such fair and reasonable rate, however, to an amount not in excess of the estimated cost of teaching personnel and supplies for instruction. As pointed out in the several decisions cited, it was realized by the Congress and all concerned that such rate would not pay the entire cost of instruction of veterans, but that it was never the intent of the Congress that the Federal Government should pay the entire cost thereof, it being assumed that the States would continue to meet their normal obligations in this request. It was not the intent of the Congress either that the Administration must pay the actual cost of teaching personnel and supplies for instruction or even the entire amount of the estimated cost thereof; in fact, the langauge of the statute leaves it to the discretion of the Administrator first, whether he will establish any adjusted rate of compensation whatsoever, and if so, what rate within, of course, the limitations stated. This being a discretionary matter, it can be changed only by the Administrator and then only for the most cogent reasons or by amendatory legislation.

The regulation established by my predecessor and continued in effect by me is based upon this fundamental principle plus the consideration that funds paid the institutions affected by the Federal Government under other laws, which funds are used for paying the cost of teaching personnel and supplies for instruction, should be taken into consideration in establishing the adjusted rate of compensation so as not to pay such cost twice out of the Federal Treasury, and, of course, the regulation contemplated that this would be done on a pro rata basis calculated upon the ratio of the veteran student population to the entire student population of the institution.

Aside from this principle of considering other Federal funds, to which it is understood your organization violently disagrees, it seems that no question is raised as to funds under statutes such as the Smith-Hughes and George-Dean Acts, but that the exception is taken to the consideration of appropriations under the so-called Morrill-Nelson and Bankhead-Jones Acts. It is argued that these acts, as did the original Morrill Act, provide endowment funds and that they should be excluded from the formula in establishing fair and reasonable tuition rates under the statutory authority cited hereinbefore. But this overlooks the fact that these latter acts specifically authorize the use of such funds for maintenance and support, and that the regulation, properly applied, takes into consideration only such portions of said funds as are actually used for teaching costs and supplies for instruction, either one or both. It is also argued that these funds would be available for such purposes, notwithstanding the veterans education and training program, and therefore, should not be considered in connection with such program, but this argument ignores the fact that a large number of veterans enrolled in these institutions since the close of hostilities would have been the responsibility of the institutions, and therefore the States, during the war years under the normal program if it had not been for the fact that instead of enrolling in colleges the youth of those years were engaged in fighting a war. It was not the intent of the Congress, as expressed in the governing statutes, that this normal obligation of the States should be taken over by the Federal Government, but that the Federal Government should assume the additional expense or a large part thereof due to the additional enrollment occasioned by the Readjustment Act educational program.

While complete data are not immediately available, it appears from known facts that of the 70 institutions involved, a number, perhaps a majority, entered into agreements properly applying the regulations with respect to consideration of Federal funds. Probably some of these institutions were not affected because they did not use Morrill-Nelson funds for paying costs of teaching personnel or supplies for instruction. A relatively small number, consisting of several very large institutions entered into contracts which were approved by the Administration's field personnel, which contracts did not comply with the regulations in that the rates established did not take into consideration these Federal funds. This resulted in such institutions being paid over the past several years more tuition than they were entitled to under the regulations, and the Comptroller General has properly required that the Veterans' Administration recover such overpayments. This he is required to do under the statutes prescribing the duties of his office, and he is also authorized and empowered by said statutes to make final settlement in any case where there is a disagreement between the parties concerned, but in making such settlement, he is, of course, bound by the governing law and regulations.

It is urged strenuously by representatives of certain of these institutions in legal briefs submitted to the Veterans' Administration that the Government is bound by these contracts notwithstanding the fact that they were in violation of the governing regulations, and that under the law relating to reformation of contracts the Administration or the Government may not reopen such contracts without affording the institution an opportunity to show other costs which might offset these overpayments, but this argument ignores the law relative to Government contracts as it has been upon many occasions expounded by the Supreme Court of the United States. Without going into legal or other technicalities, the governing principle may be stated briefly that the Government is not bound by a contract or an act made by one of its agents if he acted beyond the scope of his authority. One of the most recent and fully considered decisions to this effect is that of Federal Insurance Corporation v. Merrill (92 Law Ed. 10; 332 U. S. 380).

In exercising the authority placed upon the Administrator, and the tremendous responsibility thereby engendered, I am convinced that there has been taken into consideration every reasonable need of the institutions of higher learning maintained out of public funds and that the adjusted rates of compensation authorized by the Administrator in lieu of the customary rates have been and are fair and reasonable compensation for the education and training of veterans within the purposes and intent of the Readjustment Act, as amended. Thereunder such institutions have been afforded a much-needed means of readjustment during the readjustment period following the cessation of hostilities amounting to millions of dollars, as contrasted with which the amounts of Federal funds here involved, while not in any sense immaterial, are relatively small. It is, of course, within the power and jurisdiction of the Congress to prescribe a specific rate of compensation for such purposes, but it is my reasoned conclusion that the Veterans' Administration should not go further than it has in establishing fair and reasonable rates of compensation within the formula and limitations provided by existing law.

Sincerely yours,

CARL R. GRAY, Jr.
Administrator.

UNIVERSITY OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
Durham, N. H., December 17, 1949.

Hon. CARL R. GRAY, Jr.,
Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL GRAY: Thank you for your letter of December 12, in which you set forth the considerations you feel support your decision not to modify Veterans' Administration regulations requiring the deduction of Morrill-Nelson and Bankhead-Jones funds in determining the rate of tuition for veterans education in land-grant colleges.

I deeply regret that the persuasive reasons presented repeatedly by representatives of this association and others supporting the justice, equity, and propriety of modifying the regulations in question have not seemed compelling to you. As you have already been informed, the membership of the association is greatly concerned about this matter. We hold the firm conviction that this regulation strikes at the very integrity of the philosophy and policy on which the land-grant-college system was established by the Congress and by which the land-grant colleges have been able to make their dramatic and impressive contribution to the welfare of the people of the United States.

Our association and its member institutions are mindful of the many important objectives we hold in common with the Veterans' Administration. We are likewise sensitive to the complex problems with which the Veterans' Administration must deal in administering the veterans educational program. Because of these considerations, we had entertained the hope that an answer to the question of nondeductibility of Morrill-Nelson and Bankhead-Jones funds might be obtained by administrative action. We deplore the fact that apparently this possibility must now be rejected.

As indicated in Mr. Thackrey's letter to you of November 4, 1949, the senate of the association voted unanimously at its convention in Kansas City on October 23 to 27 to approve the following resolution:

"Whereas the entire history of Federal acts for assistance to the States in the establishment and maintenance of a national system of land-grant institutions shows clearly the endowment character of these grants; and

"Whereas the Veterans' Administration has followed the policy of requiring the deduction of these grants in determining costs of instruction as a basis of compensation for veterans education under the GI bill of rights; and

"Whereas the Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities, assembled at its sixty-third annual convention, believes that this ruling of the Veterans' Administration is contrary to sound practice and the intent of Congress in granting these endowment funds: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the association direct its executive committee respectfully to request the Eighty-first Congress to take legislative action to correct this situation if appropriate administrative action by the Veterans' Administration to correct it is not taken prior to the beginning of the second session of said Eighty-first Congress."

Under the circumstances stated in your letter, it appears that it is not possible to carry on further negotiations looking toward an administrative solution of this problem. Therefore, the association now has no recourse other than to seek legislative action.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR S. ADAMS.

PERTINENT SECTION OF PUBLIC LAW 346, SEVENTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, AS AMENDED BY SECTION 5 (d), PUBLIC LAW 268, SEVENTY-NINTH CONGRESS, DECEMBER 28, 1945; AND SECTION 2, PUBLIC LAW 377, EIGHTIETH CONGRESS, AUGUST 6, 1947

5. The Administrator shall pay to the educational or training institution (including the institution offering institutional on-farm training), for each person enrolled in full-time or part-time course of education or training, the customary cost of tuition, and such laboratory, library, health, infirmary, and other similar fees as are customarily charged, and may pay for books, supplies, equipment, and other necessary expenses, exclusive of board, lodging, other living expenses, and travel, as are generally required for the successful pursuit and completion of the course by other students in the institution: Provided, That in no event shall such payments, with respect to any person, exceed $500 for an ordinary school year unless the veteran elects to have such customary charges paid in excess of such limitation, in which event there shall be charged against his period of eligibility the proportion of an ordinary school year which such excess bears to $500: Provided further, That no payments shall be made to institutions, business or other establishments furnishing apprentice training on the job: And provided further, That any institution may apply to the Administrator for an adjustment of tuition and the Administrator, if he finds that the customary tuition charges are insufficient to permit the institution to furnish education or training to eligible veterans, or inadequate compensation therefor, may provide for the payment of such fair and reasonable compensation as will not exceed the estimated cost of teaching personnel and supplies for instruction; and may in like manner readjust such payments from time to time.

EXHIBIT V

VALIDITY OF REGULATIONS PROMULGATED IN CONNECTION WITH ADMINISTRATION OF PARTS VII AND VIII, VETERANS REGULATION NO. 1 (a), AS AMENDED, FOR COMPUTATION OF CHARGES BY INSTITUTIONS RECEIVING FEDERAL FUNDS

Question presented: Are provisions of paragraphs 49c and 75c (3), Veterans' Administration Manual M7-5, relating to the method of computing charges to the Veterans' Administration where an institution receives funds from the Federal Government, illegal and contrary to provisions of Public Law 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended, and Public Law 346, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended, respectively?

Facts: The restriction regarding payments where Federal funds were involved was set forth in paragraph 3 (G), Veterans' Administration Instruction No. 6, title II, Public Law 346, Seventy-eighth Congress, viz., "When the total cost of instruction is paid from Federal funds, as in programs designed to train war workers, the Veterans' Administration will not approve any payments." These restrictions were more clearly set forth with the promulgation of Veterans' Administration Manual M7-5 on April 15, 1947. Paragraph 49c of the manual provides that "When the total cost of instruction is paid from Federal funds, or where a portion of the cost is covered by grants from the Federal Government (i. e., Smith-Hughes or other laws), due consideration to such subsidy will be given in determining the charge to the VA." Also, paragraph 75c (3) provides that "When the total cost of instruction is paid from Federal funds, the VA will not approve any payments for tuition. When a portion of the cost is covered by grants from the Federal Government (i. e., Smith-Hughes or other laws), due consideration to such subsidy will be given in determining the proper charge to the VA." This restriction was also set forth in paragraph 5d, Veterans' Administration Instruction No. 9, title II, Public Law 346, Seventy-eighth Congress, dated August 28, 1947, with regard to the payment for instruction for institutional on-farm training.

Some institutions have heretofore failed to comply with Veterans' Administration regulations requiring that due allowance be made for Federal contributions in the calculation of the rate per credit hour to be paid by the Veterans' Administration.

Comment: Objection has been raised to existing instructions requiring that, in the determination of costs to institutions furnishing education or training under Public Law 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended, and Public Law 346, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended, due allowance be made for Federal aid grants or contributions received by such institutions under other Federal laws. Insofar as concerns Public Law 16, supra, no question arises as the matter is left wholly to the discretion of the Administrator (cf. par. 2, p. VII, Veterans Regulation No. 1 (a), as added by sec. 2, Public Law 16). As to Public Law 346, the question inheres in the amendment of December 28, 1945, Public Law 268, Seventy-ninth Congress.

On May 3, 1945, a bill to amend parts VII and VIII of Veterans Regulation No. 1 (a), as amended, to liberalize and clarify vocational rehabilitation and education and training laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, and for other purposes, was presented by this administration to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation and this proposed measure was introduced on the same day in the House as H. R. 3119 by Mr. RANKIN, chairman of the committee.

Such bill provided for authority in the Administrator to readjust payments to institutions furnishing education or training "in consideration of increased or decreased enrollment and available contributions to meet such costs, whether from public or private funds." When this proposed legislation, following consideration in committee, was passed by the House on July 18, 1945 (H. R. 3749), the original provision, as referred to in the foregoing, to the effect that contributions to institutions of public or private funds be considered in the determination of charges to the Veterans' Administration for the education or training involved, had been eliminated, and the bill, H. R. 3749, Seventy-ninth Congress, as the same passed the House, did not include, as had been proposed by this administration, any direction for or reference to consideration of contributions from other sources, public or private, in relation to costs from which proper charges were to be calculated against the Veterans' Administration for education or training. Such elimination of the provision directing that Federal contributions from other laws be taken into account in the determination of costs cannot be considered in any sense as an oversight but, to the contrary, as a rejection by the House when it passed H. R. 3749 of the suggestion that Federal contributions were to be considered in the manner as originally proposed. However, H. R. 3749, Seventy-ninth Congress, as passed by the Senate on November 8, 1945, did include authority, as proposed, on the part of the Administrator to readjust payments to educational and training institutions from time to time "in consideration of increased or decreased enrollment and available contributions to meet such costs whether from public or private funds." With these differences, in the particular in which we are presently concerned, following the passage of H. R. 3749, Seventy-ninth Congress, by the Senate and the House, respectively, the bill went to conference with the result that the legislation as finally enacted into law (Public Law 346, 78th Cong., as amended) did not include the requirements as had been originally proposed and as had been accepted by the Senate and rejected by the House, that contributions from Federal or private sources be included as a factor in the determination of costs on which charges for the education or training were to be calculated.

From the legislative history, as outlined in the foregoing, it is manifest that, in the consideration of the legislation here involved, the Congress did have before it the question of contributions of Federal or private funds to institutions being taken into account in the determination of costs upon which charges for the education or training were to be based, and in the final enactment of the law the original proposal to that effect was eliminated. The Conference Report No. 1449, Seventy-ninth Congress, first session, as reported to accompany H. R. 3749, does not include any reference which discloses any intention or purpose contrary to the action shown in the final enactment of the law with respect to the elimination of the original proposal to consider public and private grants to institutions in relation to costs. A statement of the managers on the part of the House, accompanying the conference report, referred to the bill as finally agreed upon retaining an amendment permitting the estimated cost of education and training to be fixed by regulation if desirable instead of the actual cost only by agreement, but such statement contains no reference indicating any purpose or intention in the bill, as agreed to, leaving to administrative regulation the question of public or private contributions to institutions being a consideration in the determination of costs contrary to the final action of the Congress in the nonacceptance of the original proposal to that effect.

It is believed there is an apparent reason for the action of the Congress in excluding the public or private funds from the formula of paragraph 5, part VIII, Veterans Regulation No. 1 (a), as amended. Theretofore, the authority of the Administrator was to establish fair and reasonable rates of compensation without limitation other than $500. The formula established by Public Law 268, amending Public Law 346, was much more restrictive, permitting consideration only of cost of teaching personnel and supplies for instruction. Obviously this did not permit inclusion of other costs—such as general administrative overhead, new buildings or equipment, or obsolescence of old utilities, and many other items of cost of running an institution. The Congress must be assumed to have known the Veterans' Administration measured available Government funds against these costs prior to Public Law 268; and it seems clear that the Congress did not intend that such funds should necessarily be deducted from the amount authorized under restrictive formula of the amendment.

Turning to the regulation or instruction in question, it is noted that paragraph 49 (c) has to do with adjustment of tuition payments to nonprofit educational institutions in connection with training under Public Law 16, whereas a similar provision in paragraph 75 (c) has to do with education or training under Public Law 346, as amended. The language is as follows:

"When the total cost of instruction is paid from Federal funds, the Veterans' Administration will not approve any payments for tuition. When a portion of the cost is covered by grants from the Federal Government (i. e., Smith-Hughes or other laws) due consideration to such subsidy will be given in determining the proper charge to the Veterans' Administration."

The proper charge as used therein means the adjusted rate which the Veterans' Administration agrees to pay or the institution elects to receive under the pertinent regulations issued by the Veterans' Administration. Prior to Public Law 268, supra, the Veterans' Administration acting pursuant to the provisions of paragraph 5, part VIII, Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), as added by section 400 (b), title II, of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, provided several alternative methods of determining fair and reasonable compensation to nonprofit institutions for the training under said act. Among these were a fixed amount, monthly, quarterly, or per semester, an amount equivalent to the nonresident fee of the institution, or, if none of these were deemed adequate, an agreed rate based upon specified cost data including teaching personnel and supplies for instruction. This was in accord with the principles enunciated in Administrator's Decisions Nos. 580 (August 24, 1944), and 638 (March 19, 1945). However, after the enactment of Public Law 268 it was held in Administrator's Decision No. 711 (June 22, 1946) that these several alternatives were legal, under the amended act, only in the event the amounts therein provided did not exceed the cost of teaching personnel and supplies for instruction as prescribed in the amended paragraph 5. These principles were incorporated in instructions issued April 3, 1947, and can now be found in the Federal Register, part II, volume 13, No. 131, in sections 21.433 to 21.448, inclusive. (See also section 21.531.) While it was administratively determined after the date of Administrator's Decision No. 711 that the nonresident rates charged by various institutions were within the limits prescribed by the amended statute, it was later found that in numerous instances this was not so, and that the formula for determining a reasonable rate based upon the cost of teaching personnel and supplies for instruction, section 21.531, supra, must be applied. Still further studies now indicate that the whole subject matter of fair and reasonable rates of compensation for nonprofit institutions should be placed upon a somewhat more refined basis—particularly in view of probable decreased enrollment of veterans and consequent change in proration of costs. It is therefore necessary to study the question herein submitted not only from the standpoint of those institutions which have or have not heretofore complied with the applicable regulations referenced herein, but also from the standpoint of what the Administrator should use as the basis for determining fair and reasonable rates for application to such institutions in future academic years.

Certain fundamental facts must be kept in mind. Under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, as amended, the least that the Administration may pay for tuition and other expenses of veterans enrolled in courses of education or training thereunder is the customary cost of tuition and the usual laboratory, library, health, infirmary, and other similar fees as are customarily charged. These customary costs are those which the individual veteran himself would have to pay if he were paying for his own education or training. As pointed out in the Administrator's decisions above, Congress, by the proviso in paragraph 5 as originally enacted and as later amended, evidenced an intent that the Veterans' Administration should in certain instances pay more than such customary costs in order that the full burden of the education and training of veterans should not fall upon the States, but should be shared by the Federal Government, although not entirely assumed by the latter. (See particularly Administrator's Decision No. 580, which was contemporaneous with the original enactment.) As pointed out hereinbefore, the original act placed no limitation upon the Administrator's discretion in fixing fair and reasonable rates other than the $500 maximum for an ordinary school year. The preliminary factors which the Administrator had to find were either that the institution had no established tuition fee or that its established tuition fee was found by the Administrator to be inadequate compensation. In the amended paragraph, the preliminary requirements are likewise two in number and in the alternative; one, if the Administrator finds that the customary tuition charges are insufficient to permit the institution to furnish education or training to veterans or two, inadequate compensation therefor. Having so found, the maximum placed on fair and reasonable compensation to be determined by the Administrator is the cost of teaching personnel and supplies for instruction. This, therefore, becomes the maximum which the Administrator may legally pay. But note that while he is restricted as to the minimum and maximum, he may within such extremes establish any rate which he finds fair and reasonable to permit an institution to furnish education or training to veterans or adequate compensation for furnishing such training.

It is at once apparent from the foregoing that what might be a fair and reasonable rate for one institution for such purposes might not be for another. For instance, if an institution has large endowments or other adequate funds, whether provided by public or private sources or from earnings of the institution itself, it may not be said to need any material additional amount of compensation over and above the customary charges in order to permit it to furnish education or training to veterans, and while the institution might well argue that the other alternative should be applied to it, that is, that it should be adequately paid for such education or training courses, the argument loses much of its weight when measured against the element of actual need. For example, some nonprofit institutions do not, either because prohibited or otherwise, have any charges which are denominated tuition; but such institutions generally have a number of different fees, some of a very generalized nature, which take the place of what another institution frankly terms tuition. If an institution of the former type is allowed the same rate of adjusted compensation as one of the latter, it can hardly be said that this is fair and reasonable, for either the one has been overpaid or the other underpaid.

The same observation would be true if one institution is made a grant of Federal funds and another institution has no such grant. This decision is not here concerned, of course, with courses such as existed during the war for which the Government paid the institution the entire or an agreed cost, but rather about generalized grants made to institutions based upon enrollment and other factors and for the purpose of encouraging the carrying on of certain types of courses or instruction. And while the Congress did not see fit to specify as recommended by the Veterans' Administration that all such amounts be taken into consideration in fixing the fair and reasonable rates, and while, therefore, such amounts need not be deducted in toto from the amount which would otherwise be payable under the formula prescribed by the regulation, such amounts do necessarily enter into the question of what is necessary in addition to enable the institution to furnish education to veterans or what is adequate compensation for education or training so furnished. Viewed from this aspect, the regulations, if properly applied, are certainly within the terms of the governing statute and are therefore valid. A proper method of applying this would be to prorate such grants or other sums rather than to charge all of it against the formula; which as a matter of law would be within the intent of the act as amended. This also would be the "due consideration" specified by the regulations.

Held: The provisions of the regulations in question properly applied are not contrary to the provisions of either Public Law 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, or Public Law 346, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended. Those institutions which have not complied with such regulations, and as a consequence have received more compensation than they were entitled to under the law, should be required to comply therewith through an adjustment to be made in the amount to which they would otherwise be currently or in the future entitled. As to any institution which received less, due to any improper application of the regulations, it would seem—unless protest was made at the time—there would be no basis for adjustment, as presumably they were able to furnish the education or training with the amount of compensation received, and hence the rate was fair and reasonable. (Opinion of the Solicitor dated March 15, 1949, approved March 30, 1949.)

This decision is hereby promulgated for observance by all officers and employees of the Veterans' Administration.

CARL R. GRAY, Jr.,
Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

POLITICAL PRESSURE TACTICS IN WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on Tuesday, January 10, 1950, I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, beginning on page 276, the text of a release which I had prepared regarding certain outrageous political tactics being followed in Wisconsin by the Democratic Party finance headquarters in Milwaukee. I pointed out that letters were going out from the Democratic central organization pressuring humble civil-service employees into making political contributions into the party's treasury.

Such pressure letters were, I indicated, contrary to the spirit, if not to the letter, of present statutes. It seems to me that a violation of the spirit of statutes is equally, if not more, reprehensible than a breaking of the actual letter of the law, because a violation of the spirit of the statutes strikes at the very fundamentals of civil service.

Since releasing that statement, newspaper editorials and comments all over Wisconsin have confirmed the judgment which I expressed, namely, that civil-service employees—postal workers and others—were being bombarded by these pressure letters.

Of course, Democratic headquarters in Milwaukee denied my charge, using some lame excuses, moans, and groans. A spokesman for the Democratic Party attempted to prove that the letter which had come into my possession and which had been received by a postal worker was purely an isolated letter and that the communication had gone to the postal worker perhaps by accident or coincidence.

Well, Mr. President, it has since been confirmed that this was not an isolated pressure letter, but a part of a mass campaign.

Attorney General McGrath, whom I asked to investigate these "blackjack" tactics, has acknowledged my communication and I am awaiting a further report from him.

In the meanwhile, however, it is most unfortunate that the Senate on Thursday, January 19, decided to enact substantial changes in the Hatch clean-politics law. I have previously commented on the floor of the Senate on my grave concern over the wisdom of any such changes. I felt that to place removal of civil-service employees for political activities at the discretion of the Civil Service Commission would obviously be opening the door to dirty politics, and I mean "dirty."

This, of course, is an election year, and each of us tends to approach the election problem from our own individual and sometimes partisan standpoint.

I do, however, feel, Mr. President, that this should be an issue above partisanship. I do not believe that civil-service employees should participate in Republican activities, any more than I believe they should participate in Democratic activities, nor do I believe they should be pressured into making contributions to the GOP any more than into making contributions to the Democratic Party.

Suffice it to say, however, at this point, that I feel that the administration in pushing the amendment to the Hatch law has committed a grave mistake in terms of the welfare of the American people and that someday that mistake may boomerang against the Democratic Party itself.

We have made much progress in this country in taking politics out of civil service, but now I am afraid the Senate has taken a backward step and that much progress has been canceled out.

At any rate, I, for one, expect to continue my battle to keep politics clean in my own State. My own State, Mr. President, has had a wonderful record, and, I may say parenthetically, it does not make any difference whether under a Democratic, a Republican, or a Progressive regime, there has been nothing but clean politics in the State of Wisconsin throughout the years—and to keep the civil service untainted by political intimidation. That, Mr. President, will be one of my objectives.

DELIVERED PRICE SYSTEMS AND FREIGHT-ABSORPTION PRACTICES—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1008) to define the application of the Federal Trade Commission Act and the Clayton Act to certain pricing practices.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, before action is taken on that question, I wish to make a statement. First, I wish to pay my respects to the conferees for the industry and energy they have displayed in attempting to get the legislation ironed out and to have freight absorption legalized, in the interest of all industry, and especially of the small-business men of the country.

As I understand, the distinguished junior Senator from Maryland asks that the Senate disagree to the conference report and that a new conference be asked so further consideration can be given to the proposed legislation. I am perfectly content that that be done. That is a proper thing to have done under the procedures of the Congress. I want to make it indelibly clear, however, Mr. President, that when I agree to reject the conference report, I do not want the RECORD to show that I am in disagreement with the legislation which has been brought back by the conferees for adoption by the Senate. I believe in it. I believe it will be a wholesome thing to legalize existing practice so that those who want to absorb freight can do so without violating any of the antitrust laws. I feel very strongly the need for legislation of this kind.

I shall go along with the request of the distinguished Senator from Maryland to defer action, but it is my hope that the conferees will meet without undue delay and that the legislation will be ironed out and brought back to the Senate for adoption. I think such legislation is reasonable. I think it is constructive. I hope that when the conferees bring it back there will be no doubt that the legislation which will then be presented to the Senate of the United States will clarify the situation which now exists.

I wish to make one more statement. During the last session of Congress Senators who oppose this legislation rose on the floor of the Senate over and over again and stated they felt it was in violation of the antimonopoly laws; that it would violate the pricing laws, and so on and so forth. They contended that the Department of Justice would never approve the legislation, and that, if enacted, it would probably be vetoed at the White House. It is my understanding that the Department of Justice has approved the legislation, with the possible exception of the amendment to section 4. I ask the Senator from Maryland if that statement is correct.

Mr. O'CONOR. In answer to the question of the Senator from Nebraska I will say the statement is correct. We sought and obtained from the Attorney General of the United States and from the head of the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice a written statement to the effect that with the change as proposed the legislation would meet with the approval of the Department of Justice and would not be destructive of the antitrust laws.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the distinguished Senator from Maryland for his answer.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Does not the Senator from Nebraska know, however, that the Federal Trade Commission, which has the primary responsibility in this matter, is opposed to the legislation in its present form; not ony to section 4D but to the other sections?

Mr. WHERRY. I am not wholly aware of what the Federal Trade Commission does stand for. I think there are conflicting opinions in the Commission, if I am correctly informed. Will the Senator agree with me in that statement?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I may call the attention of the distinguished Senator to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday, at page 609, where there is published a statement presented by the Federal Trade Commission; that four members of the Commission submitted an opinion opposing all the sections of the bill; that the Acting Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, Mr. Mason, opposed section 4D of the bill.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, there might be some authority for stating that the members of the Federal Trade Commission are opposed to section 4 as it is amended. But my understanding is, and I am sure the statement is correct, that there is a conflict of opinion among the members of the Federal Trade Commission.

I have in my hand an article entitled "O'Mahoney Bill Changes Sought," written by Joseph R. Slevin, of the Washington Bureau of the Journal of Commerce, and printed in that publication under date of January 19, 1950. I ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

O'MAHONEY BILL CHANGES SOUGHT—SENATE BACKERS WANT TO AVERT POSSIBLE VETO

(By Joseph R. Slevin)

WASHINGTON, January 18.—Senate supporters of the controversial O'Mahoney bill to legalize absorption of freight by sellers acting in good faith are expected to oppose passage of the measure in its present form.

OBJECT OF MOVE

A final decision has not yet been reached but Senator HERBERT R. O'CONOR (Democrat, Maryland) is believed ready to ask the Senate to send the bill back to a joint Senate-House conference committee. O'CONOR was chairman of the conference committee that approved the measure last fall.

O'CONOR's move would be designed to forestall a Presidential veto.

Peyton Ford, the Assistant to the Attorney General, has written O'CONOR informing him that the Justice Department will have no objections to the measure if section 4D is amended to change language the Department believes would shift the burden of proof from the defendant in certain antitrust cases to the prosecuting agency.

COMPROMISE BLOCKED

The Senate voted in the closing days of the last session to postpone consideration of the bill until January 20 (Friday). O'CONOR is expected to call the bill up then and to read the Ford letter to the Senate.

The letter was drafted by Herbert A. Bergson, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division. It has the approval of Attorney General J. Howard McGrath.

Differing versions of the freight-absorption measure were passed by the House and Senate. The report of the conference group that was appointed to iron out the differences between the two bodies was adopted by the House, but Senate approval was blocked by the threat of a filibuster shortly before the Senate adjourned in October.

Senators RUSSELL LONG (Democrat, Louisiana), PAUL DOUGLAS (Democrat, Illinois), and ESTES KEFAUVER (Democrat, Tennessee), are the leaders of the opposition.

They are expected to counter O'CONOR's move to send the bill back to conference with a motion to table the conference report, which would, in effect, kill the bill.

A victory for O'CONOR, however, would still leave the proponents with the job of pushing a new conference report through the House and Senate. Representatives WRIGHT PATMAN (Democrat, Texas), and HALE BOGGS (Democrat, Louisiana), will try to muster enough votes to defeat the proposal in the lower House.

SENATE PROBLEM

House approval still will leave the bill's supporters with the job of overcoming the opposition of the Long-Douglas-Kefauver bloc later in the session.

"I'm a simple guy," DOUGLAS said today. "I don't want to play around with wording. I'm opposed to it. It would gut the antitrust laws."

LONG declared that after the fight is over "small business will know where their friends are." If the measure is approved, he added, "it would take years to get the antitrust laws back where they were."

The Justice Department, in endorsing the measure, has made it clear that it disagrees completely with the measure's opponents. KEFAUVER and LONG have met several times with Chief Trustbuster Bergson, but emerged each time with their views unchanged.

The Department, it is understood, does not agree that the bill would drastically modify the antitrust laws. Instead, it believes that the bill merely restates the existing law.

It believes that the members of the Long group want to write a new legal doctrine into the statutes.

SPLIT OVER GOOD FAITH

The split has come on the question of whether good faith is an absolute defense when advanced by a defendant in an antitrust case. The Department believes that it is and should be.

The Federal Trade Commission, however, convinced the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit that good faith should not be a complete defense where there has been injury to competition. It advanced this theory in the recently decided Standard Oil of Indiana case.

Standard appealed to the Supreme Court and when the case was heard earlier this month the FTC had to send its own attorneys to the Supreme Court to argue its side. The Justice Department, which normally represents other agencies before the high court, refused to defend the FTC's good-faith theory.

The Department believes that the Long-Kefauver-Douglas group is opposing the freight-absorption bill now because it wants to write the FTC's good-faith theory into law.

Mr. WHERRY. I wish to read several paragraphs of the article which I think are very important:

The Justice Department, in endorsing the measure—

The measure that was brought back by the conferees—has made it clear that it disagrees completely with the measure's opponents. KEFAUVER and LONG have met several times with Chief Trustbuster Bergson, but emerged each time with their views unchanged.

The Department, it is understood, does not agree that the bill would drastically modify the antitrust laws. Instead, it believes that the bill merely restates the existing law.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WHERRY. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Louisiana in a moment. Permit me to continue to read from the article:

It believes that the members of the Long group want to write a new legal doctrine into the statutes.

The split has come on the question of whether good faith is an absolute defense when advanced by a defendant in an antitrust case. The Department believes that it is and should be.

The Federal Trade Commission, however, convinced the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit that good faith should not be a complete defense where there has been injury to competition. It advanced this theory in the recently decided Standard Oil of Indiana case.

Standard appealed to the Supreme Court—

This is significant, Mr. President—and when the case was heard earlier this month the FTC had to send its own attorneys to the Supreme Court to argue its side. The Justice Department, which normally represents other agencies before the high court, refused to defend the FTC's good-faith theory.

The Department believes that the Long-Kefauver-Douglas group is opposing the freight-absorption bill now because it wants to write the FTC's good-faith theory into law.

Of course, they have a perfect right to do that, and I am not going to argue that question. If the very able junior Senator from Louisiana feels as he does, sincerely—and I am sure he does—of course, he has that right. The only point I wanted to make is that the Supreme Court of the United States when this case was heard did not have before it the Justice Department, because apparently the Department refused to go there and plead the case, which indicates to me that they are in total sympathy with what we are attempting to do here respecting the pending legislation.

Mr. President, I want to be fair about the matter. If there can be worked out by the conferees any adjustment that will be satisfactory to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], that is perfectly agreeable to me. That is why we have conference committees. That is why we have the mechanics which we make use of. But I want to leave this thought with the Members of the Senate: This remedial legislation is long overdue. Let us send the conference report back for a further conference, if that is believed to be the proper way to proceed at this time. Then let a subsequent report come from that further conference, so that all Members will be given a chance to vote it up or down. In that way, let us see whether we can enact some legislation which will clarify existing conditions which are playing havoc with a great many small-business men throughout the country.

Now I am glad to yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to state that the Senator from Louisiana had conferences with the Department of Justice.

Mr. WHERRY. No; I merely quoted the newspaper article. The article states that—

The Justice Department, in endorsing the measure, has made it clear that it disagrees completely with the measure's opponents. KEFAUVER and LONG have met several times with Chief Trustbuster Bergson, but emerged each time with their views unchanged.

That is what I read.

Mr. LONG. I should like to say that statement in the article is not correct. Whoever made that statement was misinformed. Although it might serve some purpose for us to confer with Mr. Bergson, at this time we have not. In the past I have discussed this matter once with Mr. Bergson, but not officially and not with the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. WHERRY. I may say to the able Senator from Louisiana that his word is good enough for me; I have found him to be entirely honest and truthful. But I may say that the fact that the attorneys for the Department of Justice did not plead its case in opposition to this measure is convincing. I say that because the attorneys in the Department of Justice are in total sympathy with the proposed legislation already reported by the conferees.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. WHERRY. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. I should like to have the Senator state his position on a proposition I shall state now, one which, of course, makes a great deal of difference to the Senator from Louisiana: I wonder how the Senator feels about a situation in which a large corporation, such as the Standard Oil Co., will sell to certain customers in a given city at a price substantially lower than it will sell to everyone else in that city who wishes to purchase the same product.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, all I am interested in is freight absorption; that is all. I want a farmer to have the right to sell a mule 50 miles away from his home and be able to meet, if he has to do so, his competitor's price. That is all I want. That has been possible for 50 years in this country. However, if we do not act in this matter, that right will not be continued.

This measure will not hurt competition. It will stimulate competition. The fact that the Department of Justice does not uphold the position of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana is convincing evidence to me that this measure will not in any way create monopoly, so far as prices are concerned. That is my feeling about it. Instead of reducing business, instead of restricting it to small, local areas, I want all the competition we can get for business, every bit of it. Competition is the way to get low prices. That is the way to get things sold to consumers at the lowest possible prices.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Nebraska is a small-business man, I believe.

Mr. WHERRY. Yes; very small.

Mr. LONG. He knows other small-business men. I feel that he understands the evils of a situation in which large-scale purchasers, such as chain stores, are able to buy the goods they need at prices substantially lower than the prices at which small-business men can buy the goods they need. I think he will agree with me that the effect of such a procedure is to put small-business men out of business.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana is contending that good faith should not be a complete defense. The Senator says that is one thing that cannot be done. Very well, Mr. President, I shall not argue the legal point. We shall leave that to the Supreme Court, when it makes the final decision, at the time of the final test.

All in the world that those of us who believe in this proposed legislation want to do is permit one who has merchandise to sell, no matter whether it is candy bars or chewing gum, or this, that, or the other thing—to sell it anywhere in the United States, and to sell it at a price which will enable him to compete with other similar merchandise—for instance, in the case of a candy bar, possibly at a price of 5 cents—and be able to absorb the freight, if he wishes to do so, in order to sell the candy bar at that price to everyone who will buy it in any of the 48 States. That is what we want to be able to do with our cattle and with everything else produced in our State. We want competition. There will be competition if the Congress permits it to continue to exist as it has existed.

This proposed legislation will not change the procedure one iota. If there is any monopoly, a suit against it will still be able to be filed under the Clayton Act; the existing procedures still will be able to be used to accomplish everything the Senator has been discussing.

But at the same time, if we finally enact into law the sections of the conference report, other than section 4, as we would like to have them, freight absorption will then be possible, so that if a sugar-beet producer at Scottsbluff, Nebr., wishes to sell his sugar beets at New York at the same price at which he sells them at Scottsbluff, and to absorb the freight from Scottsbluff to New York, he will be able to do so without violating the law, provided he does so in good faith. That is the whole point.

I do not intend to get into an argument now on the merits of this matter. We shall do that again. I do not wish to hold up the Senator from Maryland on the work he has done.

I say to the Senate, let us go ahead with the procedure now proposed. However, I wish to make it indelibly clear that I am not backing down on the stand I have previosuly taken. I hope that when the report comes back from the further conference, we shall join in permitting fright absorption in a legal way, within the confines of this great country.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. THYE. If the conference report is not finally enacted into law, the confusion which presently exists among processors and manufacturers will continue; will it not?

Mr. WHERRY. Certainly.

Mr. THYE. The big manufacturer who can afford to purchase a fleet of trucks will acquire them, and will ship his merchandise in them, and thus, we might say, will be able to get around any restrictive measures which might be imposed against him under any existing legislation or under the basing-point court decision.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. THYE. So unless we enact legislation of the type now proposed, instead of aiding and benefiting small business, we shall simply continue to add to the difficulties of small business. The result will be to destroy one small business after another, because they will be unable to meet the competition with which they are confronted, in view of the fact that the large operators will be able to acquire their own fleets of trucks and, using those trucks will be able to move freight in any manner in which they wish, whereas the small operators will not be able to afford to operate in that way. Therefore the small operators will have to go out of business, and the large operators will take their business.

Mr. WHERRY. Certainly. I thank the Senator for his observation.

Mr. President, as I have said, I do not wish to get into a discussion of the merits of this matter. However, it is obvious that unless we enact legislation of this sort, the only thing for the small-business men who are fabricators to do will be to move from their present locations to the places where the raw products they use in their operations are produced. For instance, let us consider the manufacturers of washing machines or refrigerators who need steel. If they cannot continue to operate on a freight-absorption basis, they will have to move to Pittsburgh or Chicago, to the area where the steel they need is produced. Then there will be another difficulty with freight rates; they will have unfair competition there.

I have just talked to a steel operator who, because of unfair charges by the railroads, has to pay for steel a different price to three producers in his own city, the prices varying about a dollar a ton. On the old basis, the manufacturer producing steel for a dollar a ton less will be able to take over all that business, unless the other producers sell theirs for a dollar a ton less, and thereby meet the price. The producer who is nearest the point of consumption will be able to get all the business, unless producers who are farther removed from the point of consumption reduce their delivered prices sufficiently to meet the lowest price.

Mr. THYE. In our State we have canners of beans and various other kinds of vegetables. There are similar plants in Nebraska, of course. States like Minnesota and Nebraska are in the Midwest, where there is not the great consuming population that is found in the East. Since those States do not have the great consuming population, the canneries in those States are compelled to ship their goods to the areas where the large body of consumers live. Some of the goods go to Chicago; some go to Philadelphia; some go to New York—or to other eastern or seaboard cities, wherever there is a demand for those goods.

Mr. WHERRY. Yes.

Mr. THYE. If the restriction continues, those particular processors will be absolutely out of the picture, because of the court decision, and they will either have to go out of business or will have to send their raw materials to a point near the point of consumption, and process them there. In such case, the farmer would have to absorb the freight for the expenses of shipment, and then, from there on, meet the competition.

Certainly the situation must be clarified.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. THYE. I am familiar with the drug business and the position it takes in this case. I think the druggists have been unduly and unreasonably excited. Nevertheless, I have been besieged with telegrams and telephone calls from druggists who ask that I block this proposed legislation. I have talked to those gentlemen. They are not quite clear how they would be harmed, but they think they will be harmed. I am willing to do all I can to help them, just as I am willing to do all I can to help the small grocers or any other businessmen on Main Street, any of the businessmen in the towns in the Midwest. But I think they are unduly alarmed over the action proposed here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was rejected.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, I move that the Senate further insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the House of Representatives, request a further conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. MCCARRAN, Mr. O'CONOR, and Mr. WILEY conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I say to my very distinguished friend, the Senator from Maryland, that we will meet again at Philippi. [Laughter.]

PROTECTION AGAINST LYNCHING

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, this morning the Judiciary Committee afforded me the opportunity to testify in behalf of Senate bill 1404, the antilynching bill, introduced last session by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], Senator Wagner, and myself. I welcomed the opportunity to testify, as in my opinion antilynching legislation is one of the most vital pieces of domestic legislation which the Congress of the United States has within its power to pass on. Freedom from fear and freedom from mob violence are basic tenets for any program of civil rights and for any enjoyment of free citizenship in a democracy.

It was particularly significant that the Judiciary Committee held hearings on S. 1404 and also on S. 1726 introduced by former Senator McGrath, in the light of the fact that the Judiciary Committee had already, during the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, approved the antilynching bill S. 91 introduced by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON]. This move was significant to me because it implied a recognition on the part of the Judiciary Committee that S. 91 is totally unacceptable, not only to the minority groups in America who would be affected by the legislation, but also totally unacceptable to the President of the United States, to his administration, and to all who are genuinely concerned with civil liberties in America.

Out of order, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the testimony I presented this morning before the Judiciary Committee, which includes within it detailed arguments in support of S. 1404 and the basis for the widespread opposition to S. 91.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STATEMENT OF SENATOR HUMPHREY BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, ON S. 1404, THE FEDERAL ANTI-LYNCHING ACT

Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my appreciation to the committee for giving me the opportunity to testify on behalf of S. 1404, a bill introduced by the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the former Senator from New York, Mr. Wagner, and myself last year. I know that Mr. MORSE would have been eager to testify in person in behalf of this legislation, but he is unfortunately away on official business. I will, however, ask your permission to place in the record of the hearings the statement by Senator MORSE 2 years ago when a bill similar to the one we are now discussing, was under consideration.

There can be very little debate, Mr. Chairman, about the advisability of safeguarding Americans against the fear of lynchings. Legislation to solve this problem has been introduced in every Congress since the Sixtieth Congress. Several antilynching bills passed the House of Representatives; the Senate, however, has never passed a bill on this subject.

Mr. Chairman, I can think of no measure which will do more to raise the moral stature of Americans in the eyes of the world than the passage of the bill which we have introduced. Mr. Chairman, I can think of no measure which will do more to guarantee freedom of the individual from the threat of illegal bodily injury and death, freedom from violence, and irresponsible mob action, than the bill which we have introduced and which we ask you to support. Freedom is the most basic of human rights. Without it, all other civil rights become academic.

I do not believe that it is relevant for us to analyze this bill statistically. Full hearings were held on this legislation during the Eightieth Congress. Adequate testimony was presented statistically demonstrating either that more than 5,000 persons were lynched during the past 50 years, which would be an argument for the legislation, or that lynchings are decidedly on the decline since there have been only two or three annually in the most recent period, which would be an argument that the legislation is unnecessary. In the testimony of Mr. MORSE, which I have submitted for the RECORD, you will find statistical tables of lynchings which have taken place in the United States between 1882 and 1946.

Mr. Chairman, one lynching is one lynching too many. Mob violence has no place in America. Lynching has no place in a society based on the eternal religious and democratic principles of human dignity. Antilynching legislation represents the heart and core of a civil-rights program in America.

Just as important, however, Mr. Chairman, is the fact that the nature, character, and techniques of lynchings have changed in recent years. Today public lynchings by large crowds with great publicity is the exception rather than the rule. Today terrorists frequently operate in small bands secretly. I am informed that every year many Negroes in the South simply disappear. Statistics as regards lynchings are inconclusive in that Negroes, knowing that they are without Federal protection, refrain from exercising basic civil rights which would incur the anger of anti-Negro forces.

In 1946, the President of the United States issued Executive Order 9808, establishing the President's Committee on Civil Rights. It is significant that this Executive order came about as a direct result of a series of lynchings which took place that very year—the murder of two men and their wives in Monroe, Ga. The President, issuing the order, declared:

"The preservation of civil rights guaranteed by the Constitution is essential to domestic tranquillity, national security, the general welfare, and the continued existence of our free institutions."

He further stated:

"The action of individuals who take the law into their own hands and inflict summary punishment and wreak personal vengeance is subversive of our democratic system of law enforcement and public criminal justice, and gravely threatens our form of government."

Fifteen distinguished citizens representing the religious, labor, business, and national racial minority groups, coming from every geographical section of the United States, were commissioned with the responsibility of determining how the Federal, State, and local governments could better safeguard civil rights and to recommend to the President necessary legislation toward this end.

After nearly a year of painstaking study of all questions relating to the violation of civil rights, the Committee unanimously recommended, as one of the measures to make secure the rights of Americans, enactment by Congress of an antilynching act. The Committee was also careful to point out what such a law must contain to be effective.

It is in considering the specific recommendations of the Committee as to the content of antilynching legislation that our opposition to S. 91, the Ferguson antilynching bill, which has already been reported out by your committee, can best be understood.

Let us look specifically at section 4 of the Humphrey-Morse-Wagner bill. Our bill defines a lynch mob as "any assemblage of two or more persons, which shall, without authority of law, (a) commit or attempt to commit violence upon any person or persons or on his or their property because of his or their race, creed, color, national, racial ancestry, language, or religion." The same applies where the participants in the lynching desire to take the law into their own hands and punish the victim. This definition would clearly exclude all the usual cases of murder.

S. 91, however, does not effectively punish those who engage in lynching. It punishes members of a lynch mob only when a conspiracy can be proved between the members of the lynch mob and any State or Federal officer with the responsibility to protect public safety. The necessity to prove conspiracy is the Achilles heel of the Ferguson bill. It is the great weakness of the legislation which makes it inacceptable to all who are truly concerned with civil rights, and all who are genuinely interested in solving this vital national problem.

This approach to the problem of lynching may have served some purpose 10 or more years ago when almost all lynchings that took place involved the open participation of local police officers, county sheriff, or constable. In the past 10 years, however, in the majority of lynchings, evidence of active, open participation by police officers has been difficult to obtain. Even if the State police machinery is negligent, the open, active participants usually do not include the police officers. The most recent lynchings which have taken place would, under the terms of the Ferguson bill, not be violations of the antilynching law and would not be subject to Federal jurisdiction.

The President's Committee on Civil Rights, in delineating what an "effective" antilynching law "must contain" to be "effective," said:

"First, it should define lynching broadly," the committee declared. Section 4 of the Humphrey-Morse bill contains a broad definition of lynching.

"Second, the Federal offense ought to cover participation of public officers in a lynching, or failure by them to protect a person accused of a crime against mob violence. The failure or refusal of public officers to make proper efforts to arrest members of lynch mobs and to bring them to justice should also be specified as an offense." Sections 5 and 6 of our bill so provide.

The Committee continued: "Action by private persons taking the law into their own hands to mete out summary punishment and private vengeance upon an accused person; action by either public officers or private persons meting out summary punishment and private vengeance upon a person because of his race, color, creed, or religion—these too must be made crimes." Section 5 of our bill makes it a felony for any person whether a public officer or not to commit violence under these conditions and section 6 punishes State officers who neglect or willfully refuse to prevent a lynching or apprehend members of a lynch mob.

"Third, the statute should authorize immediate Federal investigation in lynching cases to discover whether a Federal offense has been committed." Section 7 of the bill directs the Attorney General of the United States to make such an investigation.

"Fourth, adequate and flexible penalties ranging up to $10,000 and 20-year prison term should be provided." Section 5 of our bill provides that any person found guilty of participation in a lynching shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 20 years or both.

In its report to the President, the Committee on Civil Rights stated:

"The devastating consequences of lynchings go far beyond what is shown by counting the victims. When a person is lynched, and the lynchers go unpunished, thousands wonder where the evil will appear again and what mischance may produce another victim. And every time lynchers go unpunished, Negroes have learned to expect other forms of violence at the hands of private citizens or public officials. In describing the thwarted efforts of the Department of Justice to identify those responsible for one lynching, J. Edgar Hoover stated to the Committee:

"The arrogance of most of the white population of that county was unbelievable, and the fear of the Negroes was almost unbelievable.

"The almost complete immunity from punishment enjoyed by lynchers is merely a striking form of the broad and general immunity from punishment enjoyed by whites in many communities for less extreme offenses against Negroes. Moreover, lynching is the ultimate threat by which his inferior status is driven home to the Negro. As a terrorist device, it reinforces all the other disabilities placed upon him. The threat of lynching always hangs over the head of the southern Negro; the knowledge that a misinterpreted word or action can lead to his death is a dreadful burden."

I assume, Mr. Chairman, that since the committee did report out an antilynching bill, it is unnecessary for us to make further argument as to the necessity for Federal intervention with regard to this basic policy question. The basic question our opponents tell us is a constitutional one. First, as to whether a county can be held civilly liable as our bill would provide; secondly, whether we can make lynching that much of a Federal crime that we can hold citizens who participate in the lynching criminally responsible in the Federal courts. I am not a lawyer, Mr. Chairman, but I have had an opportunity to read the scholarly testimony of the Senator from Oregon on this subject 2 years ago which I have had included in the RECORD. He said:

"It is my firm conviction that my proposed legislation is entirely constitutional in every respect. I believe that every provision in the bill is fully authorized by the due-process and equal-protection clauses of the fourteenth amendment. I believe that every provision of my bill is independently authorized and supported by the privileges and immunities clauses of the fourteenth amendment. However, since the United States has recently entered into treaty obligations with other nations which require us as a Nation to protect the lives and property of all persons within our jurisdiction against any infringement based on race, color, creed, or national origin, I also desire that Congress explicitly recognize that this bill is in fulfillment of those treaty undertakings."

The Senator from Oregon is the former dean of a law school, one of the outstanding legal scholars of America and is, in my opinion, competent authority for the proposition that the legislation which he and I introduced is constitutional. I have already placed Mr. MORSE's testimony in the RECORD for your examination.

America has given the world economic and political leadership, but she cannot and will not supply true moral leadership until every person regardless of his race or color may exercise every right as a citizen and be safe against the lynch mob.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 25) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I rose for recognition for the purpose of speaking to the pending joint resolution, but I have had some discussion with the leadership, and I hope they are receptive to the thought of having the Senate recess until Monday, and take up the measure at that time.

RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until Monday next, at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, January 23, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JANUARY 20, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our Lord, Thou whom we love to call Father, speak to us as in the days of old, as in humility and yet in eagerness we await Thy presence. Continue to work through us Thy great purposes, and bestow upon us the treasures of Thy truth. Teach us that our love and faith are tested by what we are willing to suffer and sacrifice. In our failures, chasten and forgive us; if impulsive, restrain us with Thy blessed calm.

Do Thou help the Congress in its questions, in the solution of its problems, and even in its fears, and teach us that righteousness earns its own reward, and that its highest object is man, and its greatest service love.

Hear us in the name of Him who prayed for His enemies, wept with his friends, and would not scorn even a little child. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carrell, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 1243. An act to amend the Hatch Act.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. STENNIS, Mr. GILLETTE, and Mr. SCHOEPPEL to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER (after counting). Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 7]

Allen, Calif.	Gilmer	Sasscer
Blatnik	Hobbs	Simpson, Pa.
Bulwinkle	Lemke	Smathers
Burdick	Lyle	Smith, Ohio
Crosser	Macy	Stigler
Durham	Murphy	Vursell
Fallon	Poulson

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 411 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

REPORT OF NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON INTERNATIONAL MONETARY AND FINANCIAL PROBLEMS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 450)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed, with illustrations:

To the Congress of the United States:

Attached hereto is a report of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems covering its operations from April 1, 1949, to September 30, 1949, and describing in accordance with section 4 (b) (5) of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, the participation of the United States in the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development for the above period.

Previous reports of the National Advisory Council were transmitted to the Congress of March 1, 1946, March 8, 1946, January 13, 1947, June 26, 1947, January 19, 1948, May 17, 1948, August 3, 1948, March 14, 1949, and July 5, 1949, respectively. In addition to the First Special Report on the Operations and Policies of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, submitted on May 17, 1948, previous reports on the participation of the United States in the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank were included in the reports of January 13, 1947, June 26, 1947, January 19, 1948, August 3, 1948, March 14, 1949, and July 5, 1949, respectively.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 20, 1950.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn, and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 161, nays 255, not voting 15, as follows:

NOT VOTING—15

Allen, Calif.	Hobbs	Rees
Bulwinkle	Jacobs	Sasscer
Burdick	Lemke	Simpson, Pa.
Durham	Macy	Smith, Ohio
Gilmer	Murphy	Vursell

So the motion was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Simpson of Pennsylvania for, with Mr. Lemke against.

Mr. Macy for, with Mr. Burdick against.

Mr. Smith of Ohio for, with Mr. Murphy against.

Mr. Allen of California for, with Mr. Gilmer against.

General pairs until further notice:

Mr. Hobbs with Mr. Vursell.

Mr. Durham with Mr. Rees.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDING THE RULES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 133 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That paragraph (2) (c) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(c) The Committee on Rules shall present to the House reports concerning rules, joint rules, and order of business, within three legislative days of the time when ordered reported by the committee. If such rule or order is not considered immediately, it shall be referred to the calendar and, if not called up by the Member making the report within seven legislative days thereafter, any member of the Rules Committee may call it up as a question of privilege and the Speaker shall recognize any member of the Rules Committee seeking recognition for that purpose. If the Committee on Rules shall make an adverse report on any resolution pending before the committee, providing for an order of business for the consideration by the House of any public bill or joint resolution, on days when it shall be in order to call up motions to discharge committees it shall be in order for any Member of the House to call up for consideration by the House any such adverse report, and it shall be in order to move the adoption by the House of said resolution adversely reported notwithstanding the adverse report of the Committee on Rules, and the Speaker shall recognize the Member seeking recognition for that purpose as a question of the highest privilege."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, though I am calling up this resolution, it is not my resolution. It is rather a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox], to whom I will yield later on, to speak in favor of his resolution. I myself have been and am opposed to it.

Mr. Speaker, when I came to Congress 44 years ago Republican Speaker Cannon was the czar of the House and had the House at his mercy. The country resented Cannon's power. This abuse of power on his part brought about the defeat of the Republican Party. The Democrats, with the aid of the progressive Republicans, took away from the Speaker his great power by liberalizing the rules of procedure under the Norris resolution.

The present unholy alliance formed by the reactionary Democrats and reactionary Republicans on the Committee on Rules is an attempt to emulate and restore that power to the Committee on Rules and again hope to have the House at their mercy.

Because the Committee on Rules is a policy committee, yes a procedural committee, designed to carry out the recommendations of the party in power that is supposed to carry out the mandate of the people, it is composed of eight Members representing the majority and four of the minority. All other legislative committees are composed of a bare majority.

There is an unfortunate condition that exists in the Rules Committee because, as I have stated, three members of the Committee on Rules elected as Democrats on the Democratic ticket in name only, unfortunately vote and gang up with the Republicans, leaving me, the chairman, and the other real Democrats on the committee in a minority. Consequently, the Committee on Rules has been unable to report rules on bills approved by legislative committees and recommended by the President. The majority has been unable to work its will.

In view of this unfortunate situation, the House adopted House Resolution 5 in the first days of the first session of the Eighty-first Congress. This was in the interest of orderly procedure and in order to expedite legislation so as to preclude the Committee on Rules from bottling up legislation.

That resolution permits chairmen of various legislative committees to file their own 21-day discharge petition and call their bill up on the floor if the Committee on Rules fails to act.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] and his two other colleagues, in conjunction with the four Republicans, as I pointed out previously, reported out this resolution—House Resolution 133—which will kill and sabotage the rights of committees under the new rule.

Up to now, 33 resolutions have been filed under the new liberalized rule by chairman of legislative committees desirous of availing themselves of their rights. All will be dead if this unfortunate resolution should pass.

The charge that the Committee on Rules is now deprived of all power is erroneous, because in the last session it reported 88 rules and 27 resolutions.

If the committees wish to be deprived of their rights they will vote for the Cox resolution.

If they expect their bills to be acted upon and considered by the House, they must vote against it.

I personally believe that if the existent coalition between the Republicans and the three reactionary Democratic members of the Committee on Rules did not exist, the new 21-day rule would not have been necessary. If these three so-called Democrats would vote as Democrats—owing their allegiance and duty to their party, and not call themselves Democrats in name only, as I said before, the new rule would not have been necessary. The result is that legislation recommended by the President and promised by the Democratic Party could be brought to the floor for consideration by the membership.

I have heard it said that at all times chairmen of committees try to gain more and more power. That is not true in my case, and will never be true. I believe that the membership should not be deprived of voting on any and all legislation approved and reported by committees after full and complete hearings and consideration. I have been a member of the Committee on Rules for 20 years, and chairman for 10 years. During all those years I have at all times endeavored to safeguard the interests of the membership and of the country.

I have been greatly encouraged in my position against the Cox resolution by reason of the whole-hearted support from the American Federation of Labor, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, the railway labor unions, other labor organizations, and many civic and veterans' organizations, all of whom strongly protested any change in the rules of the House.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I feel that our present rule should remain in force, unchanged, in order to provide orderly procedure and expedite the business of the House. The Cox resolution should be defeated.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for the purpose of offering an amendment at this time?

Mr. SABATH. I am sorry I cannot yield to my colleague, a member of the Rules Committee, for that purpose.

Mr. DELANEY. Will the gentleman yield for the purpose of permitting me to make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my remarks may be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, it was my intention, had I been recognized, to offer an amendment to this resolution to correct the abuses that have existed and will exist regardless of whether or not the Cox resolution is adopted or defeated. Prior to the enactment of the 21-day rule abuses existed in the Committee on Rules, in that six men were able to prevent the Congress of the United States from deciding important issues necessary to the welfare and well-being of the people of the United States. This abuse was widely recognized. Therefore, on the opening day of the Eighty-first Congress, January 3, 1949, a resolution was offered in the House calling for the adoption of a 21-day rule, the rule which this resolution seeks to repeal. Prior to this first session of the Eighty-first Congress the members of the Democratic Party in caucus pledged themselves to support this change. Since then new and unforeseen abuses were born, namely, the action of chairmen of committees to circumvent the Committee on Rules by taking advantage of the newly created 21-day rule.

I supported the motion at the time because I considered it a proper corrective measure. What actually happens is this: Upon a bill being reported out of committee, a discharge petition is filed simultaneously with the application for a rule. If for any reason the Committee on Rules fails to act or report, the bill is called up by the chairman and brought before the House, thus circumventing the Committee on Rules, whose duty it is to regulate legislative traffic.

Every bill reported out of a legislative committee has some merit. The committee members reporting a bill, being enthused about their own duties and cognizant of the need of such legislation, feel they are justified in pressing for a vote on the floor of the House. It is obviously popular to vote for these bills. All committees report out bills far in excess of the greatest amount that could possibly be allocated under our budgetary system of government; therefore, Congress can lose balance and spending goes unbridled.

It is necessary to make corrections and the beginning of the session is the best time to do this. Some check must be made upon the power of chairmen of committees reporting bills to call up any number of bills involving untold amounts. For example, in the Eightieth Congress bills calling for expenditures of $20,000,000,000 were held up by the Committee on Rules. At the close of the first session of this Congress, before many of the chairmen realized their ability to call up bills by getting them out of committee early, there remained in the Committee on Rules bills calling for expenditures of about $9,000,000,000. Under the 21-day rule, these bills can be called up merely by application for discharge petition. While I do not deem it possible to balance the budget exactly, I cannot approve unbridled spending, particularly when it is conceded that the amount of the deficit will be $5,000,000,000 as it now stands.

Various motives have been ascribed to members of the Committee on Rules for the way they voted on amending the 21-day rule. I want it to be known that my sole purpose was to correct a bad situation. One of the charges made is that this change would block a civil-rights program. I am unequivocally for civil rights.

I intend to follow the line I have always pursued in fighting and voting for civil rights and other liberal measures. All this week I worked and fought to bring the civil-rights program before Congress.

When FEPC reaches the floor I will vote for it.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time, and I ask unanimous consent that I may have the right to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to my colleague the gentleman from Illinois, former chairman of the Rules Committee, for a short time, fortunately, 30 minutes.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 7 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, the issue before us is a most important one. It is much bigger than the FEPC, which is of so much concern to my liberal friends. The issue is whether or not the entire Truman socialistic program will succeed or be defeated. I refer especially to the socialization of medicine and the socialistic Brannan farm plan. Of course there are about 10 others.

Please understand me. I know well—and the social schemers also know—that the American people, that the Congress of the United States would not knowingly accept socialism all in one dose. They know it must come piecemeal and sugar-coated. That is why those people who want to make America over are opposed to this resolution. But remember that you cannot go halfway over Niagara Falls in a rowboat. Neither can you believe in being half-socialistic. It is eventually all socialism or all self-individualism, self-reliance, and free private enterprise.

I have been on the Rules Committee for many years. It is not the easiest job in the world. We have all been attacked by these so-called liberals, liberal writers, liberal commentators, and liberal organizations. That makes no difference to me, nor to the majority of the membership on the Rules Committee. We have our job to do—and with your help, we will do it.

I do not intend to infer that more than a few of you want a total socialistic nation. But I do say this—that there are but few of you who know the overall picture regarding the multitude of bills reported by the various standing committees—each one harmless in itself, but in aggregate detrimental and ruinous to our country. I know that you would not accept all of the proposed socialistic bills all in one dose—but the plan is to bring them in one at a time. Therein lies the danger.

Some will say this country is headed for socialism. I will go further and say—we are not headed for it—we are in it right now. You ask why. To you I would say that if I believed in socialism, the first two things I, as a Socialist, would want the Government to control would be the credit and the power of the Nation. Today the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks are completely dominated by the Government. Add the RFC and 30-odd other governmental agencies, and you must admit the Government controls the credit of this Nation. Next to credit, electrical power is of great importance. Today, through the TVA and other power units, the Government controls over 15 percent of our electrical power. You say we are but headed for socialism?

During the Eightieth Congress I was chairman of the Rules Committee. During that Congress the various standing committees of the House, in good faith, reported bills totaling over $67,000,000,000. All of these bills had some merit—sufficient merit in my opinion that if they should have been immediately reported piecemeal by the Rules Committee most of them would have passed the House of Representatives. We continually discussed this phase in the Rules Committee and agreed that we just could not let out all of these bills, even though we knew we would be severely criticized. The result—we were criticized, but during the first session of the Eightieth Congress we were in the black approximately $2,000,000,000, and in the second session of the same Congress we had a surplus of $8,000,000,000.

We changed the rule at the beginning of the Eighty-first Congress, and what has happened? Even though we had the second highest income in history, we went in the red, and next year all predict that we will go in the red by at least $5,000,000,000. I will go further than that—if we do not adopt this rule, you will go into the red over $10,000,000,000 this year, even though we will again have one of the highest incomes in history. Think of it—an income of $40,000,000,000, at peace, and still running in the red. What will we do should our income drop? Think of it—not being able to make ends meet with a $40,000,000,000 income. Do you realize that all the farm lands, all the farm equipment, all the farm stock in the United States totals less than $40,000,000,000—that you can purchase every home in the United States for less than $40,000,000,000? Still it costs more than $40,000,000,000 to operate our Government.

I want to speak briefly to my Republican colleagues.

Like yourselves, I went home last fall and promised my people I was against "me-tooism," the proposed socialistic program, and for economy. Is there any Republican who will deny that they did not do just that? This resolution gives you the opportunity. Your people will be watching. Make no mistake about that.

My district of northwestern Illinois is similar to most of your districts—outside of large cities—west of the Alleghenies. Years ago our ancestors went West by boat, by covered wagon, to a wilderness. They knew they had to work or starve. They worked, both men and women. As a result of their hard work, perseverance, individuality, Americanism, and frugality, we now have beautiful homes, fertile farms, and productive factories. Yes, these are the splendid monuments to their memory. Today we are attempting to dissipate these inheritances by scattering billions of dollars to the four winds, by fostering cradle-to-the-grave security for everybody whether or not they be able to take care of themselves. We are forgetting their American ideals which made America great and which is the only thing that can keep it great. We, instead, have saddled our children with a debt which will never be paid, if we continue much longer to spend more than we receive. We have already saddled them with a degree of socialism, which will take generations to eliminate.

So I say to you that we have a responsibility. I emphasize that if we adopt this resolution, we will put the brakes on those who love socialism and gigantic spending. It is crystal clear. Otherwise, those who desire that sort of thing, would not be so anxious to have this resolution defeated. Is not that the answer?

You remember that story of over a century and a half ago. They were writing the Constitution of the United States at Philadelphia. As Benjamin Franklin was leaving the meeting, the mob in the street called: "Franklin, what are you trying to give us?" He turned and scornfully replied: "A republic—if you can keep it."

My colleagues, that is the challenge. Do you for a moment believe that the left-wingers would be opposed to this resolution if they thought they could get their socialistic program easier with its adoption? Of course not.

I ask you to vote for this resolution.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COOPER). The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] has laid down the issue; and I could think that I saw my friend, my dear friend from Georgia [Mr. COX] wince when he laid it down: Whether or not the program of the successful party in the last campaign is going to be sabotaged. That is what he said in so many words. Who won the election in 1948, anyhow?

What party came again in control of the Senate of the United States and of the House of Representatives? I thought that after the campaign of 1948 no Republican would have the temerity to compare the Eightieth Congress with any other Congress that ever sat in the history of America.

We have the issue here. The gentleman from Illinois made it very clear as to why the Republicans are going to support this rule. The reason is: They can take four Republican members of the Committee on Rules and if they can get two Democratic members of the Committee on Rules to vote with them, no rule making in order any program of this administration can come before the House for consideration. That is the issue.

There is a lot of talk here about civil rights being involved in this matter. As far as I am concerned, there is no element of the civil-rights program involved in the rules as they exist today and, as, in my opinion, they should exist. The rules of a legislative body should be such at all times as to allow the majority of a legislative body to work its will. Under our present set-up, I am sorry to say, that is not the case in many instances.

When a legislative committee of the House of Representatives has labored long and honestly, and by overwhelming majority brings in a bill and reports it to the House, and it asks for the privilege of being granted the right to try their case before the elected representatives of the people of the United States, there should be something in the rules of the House, regardless of one other committee which is not a legislative committee, allowing the House to work its will on that bill.

That is the issue here and I do trust that the membership of the House in their wisdom will leave the rules of the House as they are so that a majority of the House of Representatives on any and all occasions may have the opportunity to register its will.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, there has been so much misrepresentation of the issue before us that I think it is time we attempt to clarify the situation. Left-wing columnists, news reporters, and radio commentators have been telling the country that a vote for a change in the rules will be a vote against all civil-rights legislation. The radical elements and organizations of the United States have been screaming the same propaganda. That is not true. Here is the truth:

The Truman administration and the Democratic leadership of this House could have had a vote on FEPC and other civil-rights legislation on at least a dozen different occasions during the past 6 or 7 months. Last summer Chairman LESINSKI of the Labor Committee filed a request with the Rules Committee for a rule on the FEPC bill. He also filed a resolution under the 21-day rule. Many times last session I personally asked Chairman SABATH of the Rules Committee when he was going to hold a hearing on FEPC. Finally, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LESINSKI] did appear before the Rules Committee and stated he did not want a hearing at that time, giving as his excuse that the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL], the chairman of the subcommittee having FEPC in charge, was not available, and promising he would notify the committee when he was ready for a hearing.

Later we learned an arrangement had been made whereby if a gag rule on the social-security legislation were voted by the Rules Committee, no civil-rights legislation would be considered by the House during the remainder of the first session of the Eighty-first Congress. Within an hour or so after the gag rule was voted, the President, at a White House conference, announced that no civil-rights legislation would be considered during the remainder of last year's session.

No attempt was ever made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LESINSKI] or the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] to call up FEPC legislation under the 21-day rule last year. Before the Rules Committee last week the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL], in his usual honest and frank way, admitted publicly that such a deal had been made. So the only reason why FEPC is even being discussed here today is because the Truman administration which has been giving lip service to civil-rights legislation, made a deal to shunt aside its consideration during last year's session of this Congress.

Let me call attention to the fact that in the Seventy-ninth Congress the four Republican members of the Rules Committee voted many times to send an FEPC bill to the floor for consideration, although some of us did reserve the right to vote for amendments to it. Only two Democratic members of the Rules Committee voted in favor of such a rule, although there were eight Democrats on the committee.

Let me also remind you that during the many years I have served on the Rules Committee of the House, there has never been a single time when the Speaker of the House, whether he be Democrat or Republican, has requested the Rules Committee to grant a rule on any legislation that such a rule was not granted. To my knowledge the great Speaker now occupying the chair has never requested the Rules Committee for a rule on the pending FEPC bill. If he had done so, I presume the rule would have been granted. Let me also remind you that the majority in this House can always work its will, and that no committee, including the Rules Committee, can hold up any legislation which the majority of this House wants to vote upon.

The real issue before us is not FEPC but rather whether we are going to open the way for enactment of all sorts of wasteful, socialistic legislation.

So let me say to my colleagues: If this resolution fails, the floodgates will be opened to pour in onto the floor of this House all sorts of wild, wasteful, socialistic legislation, which most of us know is bad legislation, yet which the Truman administration may be able to force through by means of political promises and with the aid of the pressure groups in this country.

Let no Member of this House make any mistake. If he follows the "me too" policy and votes with the left-wing element in this House, and with the Truman administration, as against the leadership of his own party, in opposition to the adoption of this resolution, he will be voting for waste and extravagance, for deficit spending, and for higher taxes. And I fear it will be charged he is just as responsible for the financial ruin and socialization of this country as any radical exponent of the New Deal philosophy. There may be those who will forever brand him as a "me too" follower of President Truman and the New Deal, the servant of the special interests and the pressure groups. I hope such a situation will never come to pass.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it indeed will be a tragic retrogression of our democratic legislative processes if this so-called Cox resolution is adopted. I hope that the House will reject this unnecessary and unpopular backward movement to restore unlimited power to the Rules Committee. That power existed before the convening of the Eighty-first Congress.

During the last half century this Congress has adopted two great progressive improvements in its legislative procedure. The first was the uprising led by former Senator George W. Norris, of Nebraska, against the autocratic domination of former Speaker Joseph Cannon in 1909. Up to that time the Speaker of the House was an absolute czar and dictated all legislation which could be considered by the membership. Up until the beginning of the Eighty-first Congress, a year ago this month, a majority of the 12-member Rules Committee held almost dictatorial power as to what legislation could be considered by the 435 Members of this House. The change in the rules, adopted on the 3d day of January 1949, placed the legislative processes of the Congress closer to the American people than ever before. Had it not been for this important change, several important bills which were passed by the last Congress would not have been considered on the floor of this House.

Since the beginning, our Government, and particularly our Congress, has operated under the two-party system. Every 4 years, at our national conventions, our two major parties adopt platforms which they ask the people to accept or reject at the polls. The party which wins the Presidency and the majority of Members in the Congress is duty-bound to carry out the platform which the people ratified.

The 435 Members of Congress are also duty-bound to respond to the will of the people on matters of legislation. It is undemocratic that a committee of 12 Members of Congress, known as the Rules Committee, should be given the power to pigeonhole or hold up legislation that has been ratified by the people and favorably reported out of one of the other standing committees of the House. By holding up legislation, a majority of the 12 members of the Rules Committee can thus deny the remaining 423 Members of the House an opportunity to debate, amend, and vote on legislation which the House committee has already passed upon favorably.

For years we have had the undemocratic spectacle of a coalition between Republican members and certain Democratic members of the Rules Committee divert progressive administration measures into the legislative graveyard.

The amendment to the rules adopted last year has worked in the interest of all progressive-thinking Members and has received the editorial endorsement of the vast majority of American newspapers of both parties.

The New York Times had this to say in their editorial of January 14:

> It is odd that seven members of the House Rules Committee should be able to veto measures possibly desired by a majority of the House of Representatives and a majority of the 48,489,000 voters who went to the polls in November of 1948. Such, however, may sometimes be the case. This is a point at which our democracy is still imperfect and needs attention.

The adoption of this rule change today will be a body blow at not only the President's civil-rights program, but it will curtail the great progressive program which the American voters demanded in November of 1948 when they rejected the reactionary record of the Eightieth Congress and ratified the platform of the Democratic Party. My friends on the Republican side of the House should realize that there must be some reason why the American people have rejected the Republican Party in five successive Presidential elections. My Republican friends should realize that if they vote for the adoption of the Cox amendment today that they are again serving notice on the American voters that their party is under the domination of special privilege and believes that a small minority of Congress should dictate legislation. In other words, repeated failures at the polls during the last 15 years has not taught the leaders of the once-great GOP that the American people are demanding that the voters have something to say about their Government.

Public opinion very emphatically, in November of 1948, placed its stamp of disapproval on the unholy political alliance of the reactionaries in both parties. That unnatural political alliance was the No. 1 reason for the failure of the Republican Eightieth Congress to secure the endorsement of the people. The Republican Members who support the Cox resolution today will reveal that they have not profited by past election defeats, but will continue on to further election failures by reason of their disregard of American public opinion and the will of the majority.

I hope the Cox resolution is defeated overwhelmingly.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be justifiable at this time for me to give to my colleagues of the House a description of the origin of this movement in the Committee on Rules which finally resulted in its making, by a vote of 9 to 2, this recommendation that the rules should be changed.

On or about June 12, 1949, in an executive session of the Committee on Rules, some one member, and I am quite sure that my recollection is correct that it was a Democratic member, called our attention to the fact that the trend of legislation as we could see it, sitting on either side of our table, was most significant and in a way most alarming.

At that time a tip had come to us that on June 30, 2 weeks later, we might expect a deficit in the Federal Treasury of about $1,200,000,000. On June 30 the information was given to the press and to the country that the deficit was $1,800,000,000. It was then thoroughly understood and since then confirmed that the deficit in the Treasury for the next succeeding year, that is, the year we are now living in, would be at least $5,000,000,000.

We were deeply concerned about this matter. We had no one particular bill in mind. This was long before the FEPC had been brought up to the committee. We were so deeply concerned that by unanimous agreement we asked the Legislative Information Service, headed by Mr. Dixon, to keep the committee informed from time to time, say once in 2 weeks, as to the trend of legislation which, if enacted, would increase the future financial commitments of the Government of the United States. We asked that Information Service to tell us, for example, the amount of money in the way of additional commitments which had been authorized by bills that had already passed both Houses containing additional authorizations and commitments, including the appropriations bills; by bills that had passed one House and not the other House; bills passed by the House but still in the Senate, and bills passed in the Senate but still in the House; bills which had been reported by a standing committee of the House or a standing committee of the Senate; and bills for which standing committees had advertised important public hearings. Those were bills which, if enacted, would increase the future financial commitments of the Government.

We reached the conclusion that something should be done because obviously the condition was becoming chaotic. We finally learned that if all the bills for Federal aid for this and subsidies for that and additional commitments and contract authorizations then on the legislative conveyor belt should pass, not counting the Marshall-aid program, and not counting the military-aid program in western Europe, if all those other bills should pass, the annual obligation financially of the Federal Government would be increased by $9,000,000,000.

And the bills came pouring in on us—pouring over from the Senate, pouring out of our own standing committees—bill after bill. The trouble is, of course, that under the present rule it is utterly impossible for the standing committees of the House to get together and estimate what the aggregate of their proposals may be—what effect they will have upon the finances and economic condition of the country.

For 40 or 50 years that job was left to the Committee on Rules because only to that committee came all the bills. That committee could sit there and watch the trend and make its recommendations in one form or another—to the effect that we would better go slow in this direction, because we are going too far and going too fast.

That is the origin of this request from the Committee on Rules. There is no other element involved. As a matter of fact, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] introduced his resolution in March of 1949. As it is today, I can say to you in all candor that the legislative condition in the House is chaotic—absolutely chaotic. Outside of the membership of the Committee on Rules I dare say there is not a Member on the floor, including the chairmen of the several standing committees, who can tell us just how fast and how far we are going in the matter of Government expenditures.

All the old rule did was to permit the Committee on Rules to screen, as it were, this great multitude of requests for future commitments—that is all.

Two hundred and eighteen Members could take a bill away from us by signing a petition; and if we would only use Calendar Wednesday, the standing committees would have Wednesdays to call up bills which they have reported and which are upon the calendar.

This is a very serious matter. As a member of the Rules Committee, the Lord knows I am not hungering for the exercise of power, and I do not know of any of the other 11 members who hungers for it. To be candid with you, service on the Committee on Rules is an utterly thankless job. You get no thanks. You are pulled and pushed, hauled and mauled, day after day, mostly by organized minority groups, who flood our mails with demands that their particular pet project be given preferential consideration by the House, and without the slightest regard for the future of our country. But, in a body as large as this, some group must strive to keep our house in order or else—chaos.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON].

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise from the Republican side to speak against Resolution 133. The reason I speak is that I think each Member represents his own district and has the right to vote on every major issue that comes before this Congress.

I believe that the Rules Committee should not be a legislative committee, which dams the flow, as the gentleman from New York has said, not only of the House bills but also the flood of bills from the Senate, which this group of 12 men do not want to reach a public vote.

The Rules Committee of the House was changed from the position of a legislative committee to its proper function of a procedural or scheduling committee in this Congress, and 49 Republicans voted for that change.

As one of the Republicans in the Teddy Roosevelt tradition, I am very proud of it, I voted that way. As one of the Republicans maintaining that tradition, I hope that any other Republicans who feel that way will be free to interrupt me and say the same thing.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULTON. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I support the gentleman's position. This is a question of fundamental constitutional freedom to act in the legislative branch of the Government and is not a question of action on any particular bill. I do not believe that any Member of the Congress needs to be told whether he may or may not vote on an issue which has gone through the screening of the appropriate standing legislative committee. There is an ingrained attachment among the American people for making one's position clearly known especially when there is a difficult decision to be made, and this belief is one of the fundamental bases for our freedom. This proposition should certainly apply to us as legislators. I feel that in voting against this resolution I am acting in that typically American tradition.

Mr. FULTON. I am sorry there is not time for the ones I see standing. May I close by saying that this is not a partisan matter, but is one of basic democracy in each Congressman representing the people in each of the districts of this country. Each Representative should meet the issues squarely, be recorded publicly for all to see, and each should be willing to take his full responsibility, instead of having major decisions made by arrangements between minorities of the members on the Rules Committee, excellent though their service might be.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY].

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe this is one of the most important issues that I have ever voted on in the 12 years I have been in Congress.

In opposing this retrogressive change back to the old, absolute power of the Rules Committee, I am more sure that I am right than on any other issue I have voted on in 12 years.

I am amazed at the argument made in favor of the change back to the gagging of the sovereign representatives of the people of this country. Do we not trust ourselves? Must we have a group of 12 men on the Rules Committee to protect myself against myself, or you from yourself?

Must we say to the people of this country who have elected you Congressmen to represent them here that you men whom they send here cannot be trusted with the safety and security of their country?

Who are these irresponsible people that these 12 committee men are trying to protect the country from? Here we are, the Democratic Party; and you, the Republican Party, because you have quite a membership in this Congress too.

This is not an issue of FEPC and must not be confused with it. This issue so far transcends anything of that nature that it is of no use even to discuss that issue compared with this basic question of preserving our system of representative government.

The men who wrote the Constitution in Philadelphia intended that the people should have the power in this Government, and they made us, the Congress, the people's branch. Yet now they are trying to take that power from the people's branch, the branch to which the Constitution gave more power than any other. This resolution would remove the powers from the 435 Members of Congress and give it to 12 men, who in star-chamber session would decide on the issues upon which Congress can vote.

All of our committees in this Congress are coequal, and no one created a supercommittee to veto the action of a coequal standing committee. Mr. Speaker, let me tell you that I have almost seen red as the great chairman of my own committee has gone before the Committee on Rules—and you members of other committees have seen this, too—and has been treated far worse than any lobbyist would be treated in the standing committees.

Mr. Speaker, this is an issue that the people understand; every college student, yes, every high school student understands what the gag rule of the Rules Committee means in the House of Representatives just as they understand what a filibuster means in the Senate.

The other body is to be credited at least with having to work hard on the floor of that body to prevent legislation from coming up to a vote over there. This resolution would do it the easy way, we would have a committee to protect this Membership, the sovereign representatives of the people of this country, from going on record.

Maybe Congress is irresponsible sometimes; if we are—this is not the way to correct it. The way to correct the evil of which my distinguished and honorable colleague from New York spoke is for the individual Members of this Congress to accept the grave responsibilities their constituents place on the people's branch.

There are no Reds in favor of this resolution; the Reds are not interested in defeating this rule. Top-level organizations that have supported the strengthening of the people's branch of Government, the reorganization of Congress, were emphatic and determined in the stand that you could not have a good, effective Congress unless you repealed the obsolete, antiquated system of control by the Committee on Rules.

Do not vote yourselves back into being bound and gagged and delivered to the control of the Rules Committee of this House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] the proponent of this resolution.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, in bringing this resolution here for consideration I do so without fear of punishment or hope of reward. For me there is nothing selfish about it. Any glamour that may have once attached to being a Member of this great body has for me long since passed. It is to the public welfare, and to the public welfare alone, that I subordinate every other consideration. I do not deem it to be particularly important that any Member of this body retain his seat; but I do know it to be of tremendous importance, Mr. Speaker, that while here he maintain the courage to do right and that he labor unceasingly for the public good.

Mr. Speaker, as redecorated, this is a beautiful Chamber in which we assemble. But I would make one addition. I would nail over every entrance to it the sign "Stop, look, and listen."

From my recent visit home I came back here wishing to take some cognizance of the worry which the people of the country are undergoing. I wish to take some recognition of the state of public opinion. And I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that public opinion is demanding of this body that it plant its feet upon solid ground and that Members keep their eyes upon the Flag.

When this House adopted the 21-day rule, it took the governor off the legislative engine, which has since been running wild. This resolution, Mr. Speaker, is merely an attempt to put them back on in the interest of orderly and responsible legislative procedure.

Mr. Speaker, it is not true, as has been asserted, that the adoption of this resolution would stymie the President's program; it is not true, Mr. Speaker, that the adoption of this resolution would check the progress of bills reported by the legislative committees of this House. Going back to the old rule under which the Rules Committee operated up until January a year ago is not retrogression. This rule to which we propose to return is a rule that was adopted by a Democratic House in 1931 after the Democrats came into power. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that that rule was made more stringent than the rule previously existing. It was provided in that rule that it would take a majority of the membership of this House to discharge the Rules Committee, whereas previously a lesser number was sufficient.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make this statement, which may or may not be astounding to many: There has never been a time when the present Speaker of this body, or his predecessor, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], made request of the Rules Committee for a rule on any bill but what the request was honored, and I now call upon both to witness the accuracy of this statement.

This resolution should be adopted or else the Committee on Rules abolished.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER].

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, there has been a good deal of talk here about gagging, and not allowing Members of the House to work their will. Last year before the session opened the Democrats in caucus agreed to change the rules, and bound the members of the caucus to support the new rules as adopted in that caucus. Then what happened? The Republicans learned about it by reading the press. The Republicans had no caucus scheduled, but the policy committee of the Republicans on this side of the aisle met to discuss what they should do and the position they should take with regard to the change of the rules. That committee authorized me, as a member, to bring before the full membership of this House an amendment to the rule governing Calendar Wednesday so as to stop any filibustering on that day, and to make it possible on that day, in accordance with our standing rules, for any committee chairman, as his turn was called, to bring up any matter that had been approved by his committee without regard to any action of the Committee on Rules. What happened? When we got on the floor of this House the chairman of the Committee on Rules moved that the House adopt the rules of the previous session with certain amendments. The amendments were read. Then the chairman of the Committee on Rules moved the previous question. We were debarred by that motion from even discussing the implication of this rule. We were debarred from offering any amendment. Here is the amendment in my hand as it came to me from the Speaker's desk, as it was returned to me, because I was not allowed to offer it.

If you talk about a gag rule, if you talk about shutting a minority off so that they have no voice whatever in how this House is run, then go back to the procedure that was offered here. In my opinion it was an outrageous method of pretending, in the guise of liberalism, to use the most drastic gag method that was ever adopted on the floor of this House.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to support the resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX]. I think all of the members of the Committee on Rules, regardless of what you may think about its membership, do not enjoy their service on that committee. It is a very difficult, arduous, and unpopular job. The Democratic Party has twice as many members on that committee as the Republicans have. I think we should go back to our orderly procedure, and then on Calendar Wednesday allow the committee chairmen to bring up bills that they may not have gotten a rule on from the Committee on Rules. That would be orderly procedure.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

RULES COMMITTEE GRAB FOR POWER THREATENS REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, on the opening day of the Eighty-first Congress it was decided that a majority of the 435 Members of this body have the intelligence and the fortitude to decide whether or not they want to take up for debate a bill reported by a standing committee of the House.

The principle then agreed upon is about as revolutionary as our Constitution and just as basic as that historic document to American principles of representative government.

I wonder how many Members really believe that they were authorized by the people of their districts to abdicate their legislative responsibilities to a little group of six or seven members in the Committee on Rules.

Of course, without effective organization and procedures the Congress cannot do its job. But never should the rules be used as an obstruction to the legislative process.

During the first session, under the 21-day rule, the Committee on Rules exercised its proper function of scheduling the priority of bills reported by the other committees. In those few instances in which the Rules Committee did not act within 21 days, the chairman of the committee reporting a bill could obtain recognition from the Speaker to call up the measure.

Much has been said about the desirability of protecting the Members of the House from the embarrassment of voting on controversial legislation. It has been suggested that the Committee on Rules, consisting of Members who do not embarrass easily, can more appropriately serve as the watchdog of the Treasury than can the 43 members of the great Committee on Appropriations.

It was a famous Republican Speaker who observed "The committee is the eye, the ear, the hand, and very often the brain, of the assembly." If this was so in 1895, how much greater must be the responsibility of the legislative committees in passing upon the heavy volume of legislation that we have today.

The House necessarily must rely heavily upon the committees which, after full hearings, discussions, and deliberations favorably report a piece of legislation. The 21-day rule recognizes the important role of the committee by providing a detour, in the discretion of the committee chairman, whenever confronted by the undemocratic and autocratic usurpation of power by the Committee on Rules.

The Rules Committee has often considered and discussed the substantive merits of legislation at its hearings on applications for special orders. It has the right to do this only in the case of resolutions proposing changes in the rules of the House, over which it has primary jurisdiction. But there is nothing in the rules of this House which authorizes this committee, in considering the order of business, to review or pass judgment upon the content of bills coming from the legislative committees of the House.

This view of the authority of the Rules Committee was succinctly stated to the House by a former chairman of that committee, Bertrand H. Snell, Republican, New York. Mr. Snell, then chairman of Rules, told the House on January 31, 1931:

> Never by one single paragraph in the House Manual, not by a single sentence or a single word, as far as I know, has this House ever given the Rules Committee any substantive power to control legislation. It has not given the Rules Committee any substantive power to defeat legislation. * * * The Rules Committee is not a legislative committee. It is very largely a procedure committee. * * * The function of the Rules Committee * * * is to act in harmony with the majority sentiment of the majority of the House. * * * If the Rules Committee should start absorbing authority over legislative committees of this House, there would be real reason for the House rebelling against the authority of the Rules Committee. * * * We have never tried to dictate to legislative committees, and if we did try it, there would be real reason for criticizing the members of the Rules Committee.

At about the same time, Representative Charles R. Crisp, of Georgia, attacked the House Committee on Rules in a notable address on January 26, 1931.

If the Rules Committee is to hold hearings and review the merits of all bills reported by the other committees, then we might just as well abolish the other committees.

Mr. Speaker, I have always been a champion of FEPC and recognize its great importance. But far beyond the importance of the pending measures against which this grab for power is ostensibly directed is the question whether a few Members shall be able to block the will of the majority. I repeat, regardless of party or of the stand of a Member on any particular bill, how can any sincere believer in the democratic process vote to abdicate his responsibility to the people he represents?

Mr. Speaker, if a majority of the 435 Members of the House cannot be entrusted with the decision whether a given piece of legislation shall be taken up for debate, then I am afraid that government of the people, by the people, and for the people cannot long endure.

FURTHER ARGUMENTS AGAINST REPEAL OF 21-DAY RULE

First. It would restore to the Rules Committee the power to block bills, favorably reported by other committees, from consideration by the House.

Second. It would enable the Rules Committee to issue "gag" rules, drastically curtailing debate, prohibiting amendments on the floor, and waiving points of order.

Third. It would substitute minority rule by six or seven Rules Committee men for rule by a majority of the House.

Fourth. In recent years the Rules Committee has denied rules for the floor consideration of a score of important bills, including the following:

Pace parity bill: Seventy-eighth Congress.

Bulwinkle railroad bill: Seventy-eighth Congress.

FEPC bill: Seventy-ninth to Eighty-first Congresses.

Minimum-wage bill: Seventy-ninth Congress.

Housing and slum clearance: Eightieth Congress.

Universal military training: Eightieth Congress.

Spanish-American and Civil-War pensions: Eightieth Congress.

VA payments on cars for disabled veterans: Eightieth Congress.

Kefauver bill to amend Clayton Act: Eightieth Congress.

National Science Foundation bill: Eighty-first Congress.

Participation in international organizations: Eighty-first Congress.

Fifth. Like filibustering in the Senate, dictation by the Rules Committee of the House nullifies democratic processes and the principle of majority rule. There were many cases before 1949 in which a bill, which was bottled up in the Rules Committee, would have passed the House if it could have been brought to a vote.

Sixth. Outnumbered and outargued, some southern Members of this body appear to be unwilling to yield to the force of logic and to majority rule. Instead, they seek refuge in political chicanery and parliamentary tricks. They make much of keeping gentlemen's agreements, but they are unwilling to abide by the decisions of our party caucus.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the Eighty-first Congress the Democratic caucus approved and the House adopted the rules of the Eightieth Congress, with an amendment, which amendment it is now proposed to repeal. It has been asserted that Democrats are bound by the caucus to oppose the pending amendment. I believe that position to be untenable.

The caucus did bind the Democrats to support the rules. The rules with the amendment were adopted. They may be amended. After the lapse of a year the appropriate committee of the House has submitted an amendment, respecting which there has been no Democratic caucus. If those who contend that the Democrats are bound by the caucus are correct, it would mean that the rules of the House, once adopted, could never be amended during the entire session. I maintain that such a position is unsound.

Aside from the merits of the pending amendment, the advocates of the so-called civil-rights program, and especially of the FEPC bill that has been reported, have maneuvered the Members of the House into the position where we are confronted, so to speak, with a condition and not a theory. The advocates of FEPC oppose the amendment and they have repeatedly stated that the opponents of FEPC are in favor of the amendment. The country will thus construe the vote on the pending amendment. I oppose the FEPC and similar legislation. I, therefore, will vote for the pending amendment to the Rules of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, at the very beginning of the first session in the present Congress, this House made one of the most fundamental and far-reaching reforms in its history. The power of the Rules Committee to sidetrack or bury legislation which did not happen to meet with the approval of the committee members was drastically modified by changing the rules in order to permit the chairman of any legislative committee to call up bills after a lapse of a 21-day period.

The benefits of that change in rules were very soon apparent. It became possible for the House to pass an anti-poll-tax bill and the minimum-wage bill, as well as several other pieces of important social legislation.

In addition, the Rules Committee was persuaded by this possible curb to act favorably on housing and other vital measures.

The proposal now pending to restore the Rules Committee to its former position where it can block important legislation has been appropriately titled in a recent newspaper editorial, "Back to the Graveyard." If this body abrogates its decision taken 1 year ago and permits the former rule to be reinstated, this will be a graveyard for the rest of the Fair Deal program; it will be a graveyard for the hopes and aspirations of the American people who have entrusted us with the great responsibility of writing the Fair Deal program into law.

Civil-rights legislation is at issue here but it is not the only issue. This is an issue which our Republican friends and others who are constrained to follow them have attempted to confuse. Let us be very clear and definite about what we are doing here.

The facts are in. The issue is crystal clear. If we are to continue our fight for progress this proposal must be defeated.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the Eighty-first Congress, in January 1949, I voted for a change in the rules to permit House consideration of any bill which had been pending before the Rules Committee for 21 days without action being taken. At the time I felt it to be in accordance with democratic principles to permit a vote on major issues. However, a year's experience has proven that it is of minor value in securing such consideration. On the other hand, it has resulted in an intolerable condition in the House. The Speaker and the leadership have been deprived of all control of the program and procedure of the House. Pressure groups have assumed control. Any pressure group which can secure favorable consideration by any committee can now secure final favorable action in the House by applying pressure to the chairman of the committee reporting the bill, and such chairman's motion must be entertained by the Speaker.

If this rule is not changed it will bankrupt a Nation already heavily in debt and resorting to deficit financing. Proposals costing no less than $15,000,000,000 are pending or being advocated. If they come to the floor under present rules practically all will pass. I cannot, in good conscience, vote to maintain the present rule.

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to voice my emphatic opposition to House Resolution 133. This move on the part of a Rules Committee coalition is a devious attempt to scuttle the whole Fair Deal legislative program. If the resolution is adopted the Rules Committee will become a graveyard where the policies of both political parties and the hopes of the American people will be buried.

This resolution presents the House, I believe, with a fundamental issue. That issue is, Should legislative action be controlled by a majority of the House or by a little group of willful men who sit on the Committee on Rules. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, there can be only one answer to this fundamental question. The Constitution vests the legislative power in this House and in the Senate, not in the committees thereof. To repeal the 21-day rule would be to deny the House its constitutional power to legislate on many of the crucial issues of our time.

Adoption of the 21-day rule in 1949 was a major step forward in eliminating control over the House by a small group of men. To repeal the 21-day rule now would be to restore to the Rules Committee undemocratic and autocratic power to block legislation. It would be a step backward toward oligarchy and away from true representative government. Popular government can only be a reality under a system where the majority of the whole House can make its will prevail.

The sponsors of this resolution seek to justify it with the claim that it will stop many spending measures from reaching the floor of the House. The members of the Rules Committee seem to have delusions of grandeur. They apparently think of themselves as watchdogs of the Treasury. Surely, if any committee of the House is a watchdog of the Treasury, it is the Committee on Appropriations. I imagine that the chairman and the members of the Appropriations Committee must resent this attempt upon the part of the Rules Committee to usurp their watchdog function.

Mr. Speaker, I think the time has come for this House to admonish its Committee on Rules to attend to its own business and not to interfere in the business of the other standing committees of this body. The Rules Committee should understand that it is an order-of-business committee and that there is nothing in the standing rules of this House which authorizes it to review the substantive merits of measures reported by our legislative committees. When the Rules Committee in its arrogance undertakes to review the substantive content of bills favorably reported by the legislative committees of this Chamber, it is trespassing upon their assigned jurisdiction. Upon what meat do these would-be dictators feed that they have grown so great.

If it be objected, Mr. Speaker, that the Rules Committee affords us a refuge from voting on special-interest legislation or bills backed by powerful minority groups in the country, then my answer is that the House should have the courage to vote down such measures here on the floor, if they are not in the public interest, instead of using the Rules Committee as a shield.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I urge the House to defeat this retrogressive resolution on the ground, first, that it is a denial of the principle of majority rule; and, second, that it is designed to blockade a Fair Deal legislative program which the Democratic Party was chosen by the people to enact.

The central issue of our time is whether government by the few or by the many shall prevail. The controversy over the powers of the Rules Committee is a current manifestation of this world-wide contest of ideas. Last year the dictatorship of a minority in the other body was established by a regressive amendment of its cloture rule. Now the Rules Committee is fighting for the dictatorship of a minority in the House. The effect of these maneuvers is to nullify majority rule and to undermine popular faith in representative government. If this coup d'état is successful, it will mark another milestone in the trend in this country away from democracy and toward totalitarianism.

Mr. DOLLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise my voice to protest as strongly as I know how, the present attempt to bring about a dictatorship in this great democratic body.

I was very proud last year, to be able to cast my vote to change the rules so as to permit true democracy to function. It seems strange that in the past, legislation should have been permitted to be bottled up in the Rules Committee, so that the will of a few could control the destinies of this Nation.

It has always been my philosophy of government that the will of the majority should control; that every Representative of the people should be permitted to legislate for the best interests of all—not in committee, but on the floor of Congress.

It also seems strange, indeed, that this attempt to again change the rules should take place right before a vote was expected on FEPC legislation. Do the opponents of FEPC believe that they can thwart the will of the people by this attempt? Do not they realize that all parties have in convention favored FEPC and the passage of other civil-rights bills? Do they think that their dictatorial efforts will prevail? Do they believe also that they will likewise defeat the rest of the Truman Fair Deal program? The answer is a definite "No" because the people spoke in the last election—and they will speak again in no uncertain terms.

These puny efforts are merely temporary. Let us be men enough to face the facts. Legislation should be passed or defeated on its merits, not in committee, but on the floor of the House where all Representatives will have an opportunity to vote as true representatives of the people. We should be ashamed of ourselves to admit our weaknesses and to be afraid to face facts, by resorting to such tactics. These tactics in turn, prevent action on important legislation which is for the best interests of our country. We should be honest enough to come out into the open and put ourselves on record in voting on legislation now before us. We should not resort to underhanded methods to kill off such bills by maneuvers such as we are attempting today.

I trust that we will not go backward, but will act to defeat this attempt to change the House rules, and further that we will make the present House rules even more democratic and workable.

Mr. COMBS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a brief statement. First of all, I must confess that I have a feeling of sadness that the issue of the so-called civil rights has been injected into this question of the proposed change in the rules of the House which would put us back where we were prior to the beginning of this Congress insofar as the method of bringing legislation to the floor of the House is concerned. The injection of that issue has had the effect of completely beclouding the fundamental issue involved. Actually, as I view it, neither the question of civil-rights legislation nor any other specific piece of legislation is involved. I think it reasonably evident that no matter what action the House may take with respect to this proposed rule change, the so-called FEPC bill, in the very nature of things, will in all probability be brought to the floor of the House for consideration before the present session ends. In the first place, like any other piece of legislation reported out by a committee, it can be called up on any Calendar Wednesday without any action on the part of the Rules Committee. In the second place, it can, of course, be petitioned out by a bare majority of 218 signatures on a discharge petition. Consequently any Member who supports the proposal to restore the former power of the Rules Committee to hold up legislation with the expectation that the adoption of this proposal will accomplish his aim is indulging a vain hope and taking a wholly unrealistic view of the true situation.

The fundamental issue involved here, and the only one as I see it, is whether or not the Rules Committee shall be again empowered to deny House consideration of legislation worked out by appropriate legislatives committees and recommended for consideration. It must not be overlooked that before a bill reaches the Rules Committee it has already been considered by the appropriate legislative committee, and already has been recommended for House consideration. The Rules Committee still has an important function in channeling legislation under existing rules, both as to the order in which bills shall be considered and in recommending the type of rule under which consideration is to be had in the House.

As I view it, the present rule does not unduly limit the Rules Committee. A good deal has been said about the damage to the prestige of that committee. And in that connection I ask, What about the prestige of all the legislative committees of the House, whose primary duty it is to conduct hearings and patiently consider over a period of weeks and months various phases of proposed legislation? Must their recommendation that the House consider a bill be subject to absolute veto by the Rules Committee, which has conducted no hearings and which, in the very nature of its work and the great number of requests for rules it must consider, cannot give to the many bills which come to it the thorough study that legislative committees are supposed to give?

As I view it, to so empower the Rules Committee to hold up consideration of bills is to lodge in it an arbitrary power to deny to the membership the right to debate and consider legislation of any and all kinds. We here in this House are the chosen representatives of our people. We are supposed to be able to think and to have the courage to vote according to our best judgment upon all issues that may come up in Congress affecting the interests of our people. I rebel at the thought that we of the House of Representatives have not the courage and forthrightness to perform the fundamental duties that devolve upon us as lawmakers for our people.

Issues are never settled by ignoring their existence nor by refusing to meet them. I believe in democracy and in the democratic process. The very bedrock upon which representative democracy rests is that the people's Representatives in Congress shall meet and insofar as in their power lies resolve the issues that confront the Nation. Only in that way can we retain the faith and the confidence of our people in the Congress of the United States.

We can and will deal with specific legislation when it comes to the floor. Today there is but one thing for us to consider and that is the democratic legislative process. So far as I am concerned, I feel no need for any committee or other device to shield me from the necessity of facing any issue, whether it be FEPC or any other. As a Representative I shall face each piece of legislation as it arises and do my simple duty as I see it. I am opposed to the backward step that the adoption of this resolution would take. A year ago we adopted what I think is a more democratic rule of procedure and until we have had more experience with it it should be retained in the interest of enabling the House to work its will as to what legislation shall be taken up for consideration. I shall not support the resolution to return us to the old rule and thereby say to the people I represent that I have not the courage to come into the open and take my stand on any bill that may be reported out by a committee of this House.

And as for the suggestion made by several speakers during this debate to the effect that only a powerful Rules Committee can save this Nation from bankruptcy by excessive appropriations, I share no such view. That argument assumes that the majority of us here are so wanting either in intelligence and courage or concern for the welfare of our country that for purpose of expediency or political gain we would vote the Nation into financial ruin. I entertain a higher opinion of the integrity and patriotism of the Members of this House than to subscribe to such a view. If I so believed, I could hardly indulge much hope for the future of this Nation. For, if that is true, then the democratic institutions created by the founding fathers can no longer be trusted to the people who, after all, determine who shall represent them here in the halls of Congress.

In short, if those who entertain such a view are correct, then this democracy as we know it is in grave peril. For surely merely technical rules procedure could not protect the country from a supine, cowardly, and faithless Congress. I have no doubt that I shall find it necessary to oppose as strenuously as I know how some bills that will reach the floor. But I prefer to discharge my responsibility by facing the issue rather than to avail myself of the device that will deny to all Members, as well as myself, the right to consider and support or oppose legislation. I think there has been altogether too much excitement created over the pending measure. Personally, I have an abiding faith in the soundness of our democracy. I believe devoutly not only in the right of the people to rule, but also in their capacity to rule. And it is my honest conviction we can best serve at this moment by retaining our present rule and opposing the proposed change.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, a year ago the Eighty-first Congress, under Democratic Party control, took one of the most forward, progressive steps in over 50 years in Congress when it amended the rules of the House to curb the arbitrary authority assumed by the Rules Committee to gag the membership and prevent consideration of legislation vital to the welfare of the Nation.

Today a coalition of Republicans and others in the House ask us, through this resolution, House Resolution 133, to go backward—a habit, not uncommon to the GOP, and reerect the Rules Committee as an all-powerful group which can completely throttle the will of the majority in this House.

Unwilling to accept the verdict of the people in the November 1948 elections, and in defiance of the wishes of the American people, this group, with the Republican leadership in the vanguard, again seeks power to bottle up important legislation included in the program submitted to Congress by the President of the United States. President Truman sought approval of his program before the electorate. He carried the issues direct to the people. They endorsed the Democratic platform and President Truman's leadership. The President talked plain English in his campaign—there could be no mistaking his position—neither can there be any mistaking the position of the people of the United States as expressed by their votes in 1948.

It is the opponents of the administration's program who have initiated this move to reclaim the old power of dictation for the Rules Committee. They want to be able to throttle bills they do not like—they want to sabotage President Truman's program.

I am confident the majority of the membership in the House will vote against this resolution and will not return the Rules Committee to its former tyrannical position.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the coalition of conservative Republicans and Dixiecrats is determined to reverse the basic principles of representative government. They seek the repeal of the 21-day rule on the grounds that the people should be protected from the representatives they have elected, a doctrine directly opposed to the democratic principles written into the Constitution by our founding fathers.

This unholy coalition would set up its Members on the Rules Committee as a superjury to decide what legislation the people's representatives shall have an opportunity to vote on.

The action is a slap in the face of every Member of Congress who responsibly represents the people of his district, and a slap at the people who have conscientiously cast their votes to elect a Representative to legislate in their behalf.

Hirohito chose the legislation which might be considered by the Japanese Diet.

Hitler ordered the Reichstag to vote on the legislation he favored.

And now the conservative coalition seeks to install that system in our country.

Each Member of Congress is elected by the people of his District as their full-fledged representative in Congress. He is expected to have the intelligence, the courage, and the ethical standards which will enable him to act wisely on any controversial legislative matter which may be presented. If any Representative lacks these qualifications, the people who elected him should know about it. He must not be allowed to crawl behind the private cloak of any group of men because he lacks the moral courage to meet the vital issues of our day.

This move on the part of the coalition supporting the Cox resolution is a step backward to the day when six men, by a secret vote in executive session of the Rules Committee, could and did block legislation of which they personally disapproved. It is a complete denial of the principles of representative government. It is a negation of the theory of representative government because it provides a method whereby men who are public servants can make secret decisions and private deals without the knowledge of their constituents. If there is a time when the Representatives of the people should stand up frankly and fearlessly and declare themselves for the record, it is today. This is absolutely imperative if the people are to retain their faith in democratic processes.

I predict that this unholy coalition will be defeated. The House of Representatives will prove by its vote today that it is still the greatest legislative body on the face of the earth.

Those Representatives who vote to kill this restrictive resolution will justify the faith of the people who elected them. Those who vote to return again to the secrecy procedures heretofore followed by the Rules Committee will have to make an accounting to their people in the next election.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for the defeat of the Cox resolution to preserve our American democracy.

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Speaker, I shall cast my vote in opposition to the proposed change in the rules. If this change were adopted, we would go back to the former system where a small group of 12 men constituting the Rules Committee could effectively block consideration of any legislation which they did not like.

Certainly, under the present rules, there are measures before us to which I am opposed, but in the operation of a democracy it is only right that major bills agreed to by our legislative committees should be given full consideration no matter what our individual feelings on these measures.

Giving the Rules Committee power to pigeon-hole certain controversial legislation would avoid our having to be recorded thereon, but that is not consistent with our duties as legislators.

We owe it to ourselves and the country to allow free and open consideration of legislation by the entire House, not by a small committee of twelve.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to any change of the rules of the House that would give the Rules Committee unlimited jurisdiction to say whether any piece of legislation should come before the House for consideration. Too often in the past when the Rules Committee did have such authority it resulted in legislation which had been reported favorably by a regular committee of the House from coming before the House for a vote. In other words, the Rules Committee substituted its judgment for the regular committee having jurisdiction of the subject legislation.

The unsatisfactory experience that often resulted in this respect led the House last January to adopt a new rule to correct the situation. It provided that in the event the Rules Committee did not within 21 days after receipt of a bill favorably reported by a committee of the House grant a rule to bring the legislation before the House for its consideration, then the chairman of the regular committee reporting the legislation could by motion bring the bill before the House for consideration.

The resolution now before us would take away this right of the chairman to make a motion to discharge the Rules Committee and would thereby leave the Rules Committee with the full jurisdiction to determine what legislation the House should consider and when and under what circumstances. The action that was taken by this Congress a year ago was a step forward. The action that the House is now asked to take would be a step backward.

If the change now suggested is adopted, it will in effect be a gag rule, as it would enable the Rules Committee to deny members the right of expressing their views on legislation regularly reported fo. the consideration of the Congress. In my opinion this would not be true representative government.

I am strongly of the opinion that when a committee of Congress has studied a subject and reported legislation, then the Members of the House should have the right to vote either for or against the proposed legislation. I do not believe that a small number of members on the Rules Committee should have the right to preclude this.

It has always been my opinion, and I have expressed it many times in the past during my service in the House, that public questions in which our people are interested should be considered and Members of the House given the opportunity to vote their convictions as representatives of the people. I do not believe in gag rule of any kind or character that prevents the membership of the House from expressing by their speeches and their votes what they believe to be right.

Therefore, I will vote against the resolution, now before the House, that would take from the chairmen of the regular committees of the House the right to move the consideration of legislation in the event that the Rules Committee refuses to grant a rule to bring the matter before the House for action.

LET US MOVE FORWARD, NOT BACKWARD

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this resolution for the same reasons that I favored and voted for the change of the rules at the opening of the Eighty-first Congress. The arguments urged in support of this resolution will not withstand analysis. Those who urge that without this rule a flood of socialistic and communistic legislation will be enacted should welcome the opportunity to stand up and be counted against such legislation. Those who urge that enactment of this resolution will give some control over the expenditure of moneys by this Congress know that that cannot be accomplished in this way.

In the first place, it is the duty of every Member and not the Rules Committee to determine what money should be spent, and, in the second place, appropriation bills do not go to the Rules Committee. The very idea that the Rules Committee will sit back and wait until all bills calling for expenditures are submitted to it, and then it can determine which of those bills should be enacted, and then present them to the Congress as a single package, is absurd.

Neither the Rules Committee nor the Congress could ever function if the bills were allowed to pile up in the Rules Committee until it found the time to decide what the House should pass upon and what it should not pass upon. The complete answer, however, to that argument is that it is not the function of the Rules Committee to decide what the House shall pass upon, but merely when it shall be passed upon by the House and how much time should be devoted to the particular matter.

One of the most progressive steps taken by the Congress was the enactment of the amended rule at the beginning of the first session which curbed the power of the Rules Committee.

Let us move forward, not backward.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the argument on the proposed change of the rules. As I understand it, if the proposal of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] is adopted, we will then be operating under the rules that prevailed in the Eightieth and many previous Congresses.

Under the change we made at the commencement of the Eighty-first Congress it is true that much power is granted to the Speaker. I favored the change, and consequently I am going to cast my vote against the resolution.

I recognize that it is a question of balance. We should try to find some way so that the majority may work its will and at the same time not trample too strongly upon the rights of the minority. Also, I think one of the factors involved is just how much power the Rules Committee shall have.

It appears to me that the underlying fallacy in the argument of those who wish to change the present rule is that they feel that the Rules Committee must chaperone and censor what the House of Representatives may wish to consider. In other words, they wish the power to determine what shall be considered by the House because, as they say, "it might be bad legislation and might ruin the country." They want the power to sidetrack legislation that in the opinion of the majority of that committee comes in the category of bad legislation. The Members of the House are presumed to have as much restraint and statesmanship as the Rules Committee members and should not arbitrarily be denied the right to consider legislation which has been approved by the appropriate legislative committee. We realize that by a petition signed by 218 Members the Rules Committee can be discharged of its duty and a measure be brought to the floor. But that is a very clumsy way to bring legislation to the floor. It should, if considered by the House, be in charge of those who drafted the legislation, after hearings on the proposal, and who would be presumed to have a balanced judgment on the merits of the legislation.

Of course, should a Speaker show by his conduct that he was too arbitrarily exercising the power granted him under the present rules, then we should change them. Perhaps then it might be wise to consider a relaxation of the rule requiring 218 signatures to circumvent the Rules Committee and bring legislation to the floor for consideration.

It has been repeatedly emphasized during the debate many times that the Rules Committee is really a traffic committee of the House. That is true, but in the application of this function it does not mean that the Rules Committee should be able to stop legislation because it does not agree with the policy of the legislation. It should be permitted to regulate how and what legislation comes to the floor, but the committee should not have so much power that instead of regulating and expediting legislative traffic it may absolutely stop it and only permit the legislative traffic which the majority of the committee considers good and constructive.

These are some of the reasons that impel me to vote to retain the amendment to our rules which we adopted in January 1949.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, again I repeat that to place the control of what bills should come to the floor of this great legislative body, after they have been duly voted for by legally constituted legislative committees of this Congress, in the hands of a nonlegislative committee of 12 Members of this Congress is diametrically opposed to the strengthening of the democratic processes whereby and whereupon this democracy depends for its vigor and vitality.

The very first word of this statement is the word "again." I used it because, when I was a Member of the Seventy-ninth session of this Congress, I did, amongst other things, say on June 8, 1945, as follows:

> Mr. Chairman, I am not going to speak on the merits or lack of merits of the FEPC bill at this time. But I feel impelled to say that as a baby Member of this great legislative body during these last 6 months, it is a shocking experience for me to learn that there is in this House a method or system whereby a few members of our Rules Committee can prevent debate and discussion on the floor of this great legislative body, even after another duly constituted and empowered committee, in full performance of its duties and its responsibilities, has reported a bill favorably out of committee by a unanimous or almost unanimous endorsement, as was the case in point with the Labor Committee on this FEPC bill.
> I repeat, I am not here discussing the merits of this bill. I am not criticizing any person or persons. I criticize as dangerous to democratic processes any system whereby a minority controls the will of a majority to the extent obtaining in this House in a situation such as this.

And, then, again on February 6, 1946, on the floor of this Congress, I stated, as follows:

> Mr. Chairman, on the 8th of last June, on the floor of this House, I stated that I was speaking against a system which permitted the Rules Committee to stifle and choke and actually prevent a democratic opportunity to this great House for debate on a measure after a duly constituted committee reports favorably it be considered by the Members of the House. I also stated then, as I do again now, that I am not criticizing any person, but I am again protesting the same procedures by which the bill H. R. 4908, was, to all intents and purposes, made secondary and of virtually no importance for legislative purposes, by the procedure followed by the Rules Committee.

Again I speak out with all the vigor I have within me to the end that this resolution shall be defeated and that the rules of this House shall stand as they are so that the will of the majority of the Members of this House can be worked to all legislation instead of a majority of 12 men being able to choke and stifle and delay legislation, preventing it from coming to the floor unless 218 Members first go to the Clerk's desk and sign a petition to take it out of the hands of the nonlegislative committee which we call the Rules Committee. To revert to the old rule, as proposed in this resolution by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] would be to revert to the very condition against which I spoke on the two afore-mentioned occasions. My experience since February 6, 1946, and June 8, 1945, has been such that I feel even more compelled to speak out against the purpose of this resolution than I did when I was a "baby" Congressman in the Seventy-ninth Congress.

By the very text of our Federal Constitution this House of Representatives is challenged to be representative of the wishes of the people. And our technical name, as Members of this branch of the national legislative body, is House of Representatives. The American people expect us and each of us to vote according to our own individual consciences and the dictates of justice and to our individual integrity and independence. I feel we have no legal or moral right to allocate unto any 12 men a decision as to whether or not we shall have the right to vote on legislation which has first been diligently considered and voted to be submitted to the floor of this House by any of our legislative committees. I consider that I have no right, as a Representative from the great Eighteenth Congressional District of California, to allocate unto anybody a decision as to how I shall vote or what I shall vote for. Therefore, it is inconsistent with my philosophy of representative government to have our Rules Committee, in effect, turned into a legislative body. We need more opportunities, and more adequate opportunities, for individual Representatives in Congress to adequately consider legislative matters and, after due consideration, to make the final decisions by a majority vote. Only by majority processes can democracy permanently endure.

As it is imperative that more and more of the American citizens become informed and act in their citizenship duties as intelligent voters and participants in shaping their destiny, so it is even more important that we, as their elected Representatives, do not let any 12 men determine for us the destiny of the constituents of our respective congressional districts in matters of what should be talked about and decided upon the floor of the House of Representatives.

When the gentleman from Illinois, Representative ALLEN, on the Republican side, who, for many years has been a member of the Rules Committee, a few minutes ago declared that the issue was whether or not President Truman's program should become law, he thereupon made clear that he, as a member of the Rules Committee, would vote against the Members of Congress having opportunity to debate and to determine for themselves whether or not any of President Truman's program should become law. You also heard him say that, when he was chairman of the Rules Committee in the Eightieth Republican Congress, he called the members of the Rules Committee together and they, in substance, agreed upon what bills should pass the House. Therefore, he made it clear as to what his intention is by voting for turning the clock back to the status of the Rules Committee as it was in the Eightieth Congress. And, certainly, no one can disagree with the fundamentals of the declaration by our distinguished Speaker, SAM RAYBURN, a few minutes ago when he stated that the rules of legislation should be such as to allow the majority of the Members of that legislative body to work its will.

Why do some Members of this House want to make it as hard as possible for the majority of the Members to work their will? Yes; I grant that 218 Members of this House can work their will by going forward and signing a petition to take any bill out of the House Rules Committee; but can you give me a single reason why it should be necessary to have 218 Members collaborate thus to take a bill out of the hands of the Rules Committee? What right has the Rules Committee to strangle a bill which has been sent to it merely for calendaring and orderly processes in being timed as to when it should come to the floor? Should not the approval of any of the legislative committees of this great House be sufficient to bring a bill which they have duly studied and considered to the floor of this House on their recommendation that it be debated and decided upon?

And the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], who is also a very able member of the Rules Committee, a few minutes ago, indicating that the Rules Committee, in his judgment, should sit upon bills already voted for by legislative committees of this House and determine whether or not they should come to the floor for debate and decision, is the first time I was ever informed that the Rules Committee had the authority to act upon appropriation matters. I think the distinguished gentleman from New York is mistaken when he indicates that the Rules Committee would have any jurisdiction whatsoever over appropriation bills. Yet, he argued at length that in the Eightieth Congress they had learned that if all the bills then on the legislative calendar were passed, it would increase by $9,000,000,000 the Government's obligations. Inferentially, at least, it was indicated by him to me that the Rules Committee could negative an appropriation bill already approved by the Appropriations Committee. I do not believe that is the rule of this House. I am sure it is not.

It is not my purpose nor intent to here question the motive of any Member or of any group of Members who support this resolution. It is significant to me, however, that all the Members on the Republican side of the aisle to whom I have spoken about it and all Members on the Democratic side of the aisle substantially give the same reason for their support of the change back to the old rule, to wit: They either tell me that they oppose the FEPC bill or other phases of President Truman's legislative program, or that the Truman administration is leading us into socialism.

Mr. Speaker, I think I recognize some of the distinguished Members of this House who come from districts south of Mason and Dixon's line. I respect their problems. But this issue of minority versus majority rule and control and decision transcends the issue of whether any one or two or three bills shall be considered by the Members of this House. And, of course, it would be almost beyond comprehension that the majority of the Members of this House on the Republican side would be expected to do anything to help the Truman Democratic administration enact its program into law. This leads me to say I greatly respect the Members of the minority party who, more or less, regularly vote to support progressive, sound legislation which is so often opposed by the majority of the minority party on this floor.

A few minutes ago we heard two of the distinguished leaders of the minority party talk directly to certain members of the minority party in plain language and tell them that, in substance and effect, they would be expected to vote for the resolution. Yet, from my visits with a few of them, I am sure a surprising number will vote for the resolution.

It is not democracy which will destroy democracy. Only the lack of democracy can catapult us into socialism or worse. It is more democracy and not less of it which we need. It is considered, informed opinion by more people at the grass roots instead of less that we need. It is a larger proportion of the voting public which is needed to vote only after being fully informed instead of a lessor proportion of people. The perpetuation of our democratic processes depends upon majority knowledge and majority participation based upon an informed electorate which will strengthen our American way of life. I am not afraid of the decisions by an informed, intelligently voting majority. I am increasingly fearful of minority decisions.

The issue today is not the fate or success of any one bill. It is the issue of whether or not a minority, constituted of 12 members shall dictate to the full membership of this House what they shall and shall not have a chance to debate and decide for or against. I shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, those who seek the passage of this resolution are attempting to block the democratic process and to thwart the will of the American people.

It has been said by proponents of this reactionary resolution that public opinion favors such action to stop what they call the trend to statism and socialism. One wonders what kind of a yardstick they use to measure public opinion if it is not the vote of the American people.

During this debate the Republican leadership has expressed fear because the Nation's credit is controlled by our Government. Is it because they favor Wall Street control of credit and fear control by the people through their Government?

What impresses me is the fact that many Republican Members of this Congress are not in accord with the reactionary position of their leadership. I am quite sure that many Republican Members, when they decide on this question, will give serious consideration to the voting trend of last November, especially those from Pennsylvania.

They must know that the people are fed up with this kind of hokum that is being spread by Republican brass about welfare state, statism, and national bankruptcy.

It should be clear even to the dullest of persons that the people want progressive legislation regardless what kind of a tag the agents of reaction care to pin on measures which are designed to promote the common welfare of our people and of the Nation.

Today we may see some success by a reactionary alliance to ignore the will of the people and to block legislation for which the people have given a mandate.

But time and history are against it and any success it now wins will only hasten the day when it will receive a final and well-deserved rebuke from the people back home.

The Nation will watch with interest to see how their representatives stand on this crucial issue. It will also watch to see how many Republican Members will rebuke their own leadership and expose its hypocrisy of pinning unpopular labels on legislation it opposes.

Every great issue should be decided on its merits and not by what someone chooses to call it. To resort to name-calling and placing unpopular tags on legislation is the lowest type of demagoguery.

The people have a right to know how their representatives stand on every major question regardless how members of the Rules Committee view such legislation.

Every great step forward in our country had to face the same kind of reactionary opposition as we see today in this Congress.

But those who would turn the clock backward toward a dead past are fighting a lost cause and will be relegated by time and history with their fellow Tories of bygone days.

Mr. MACK of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, one of the most constructive changes made by the first session of the Eighty-first Congress was the adoption of the resolution improving the procedures of the Rules Committee in an effort to avoid constructive legislation from being bottled up in the Rules Committee. I am very disappointed to find that the Rules Committee has now passed a resolution to revert back to the antiquated procedures that were employed prior to the rules change of last year. As a member of the Veterans' Committee I strongly oppose this resolution for I know the veterans of this country vividly remember how the housing bill was bottled up in the Rules Committee during the Eightieth Congress. Blocked by a few willful men in the Rules Committee when our heroic veterans were so direly in need and deserving of adequate housing for themselves and their loved ones.

Surely, we Representatives do not need to depend on a handful of our colleagues to protect us from the embarrassment of having to vote on certain legislation on the floor of the House. I believe that we people who have been entrusted with the confidence of the voters are willing to stand up and vote conscientiously on any legislation which is introduced in the House of Representatives. We owe this to the people who elected us, to show them that we are capable of expressing our opinions sincerely and conscientiously regardless of the consequences. If we are not willing to do this, in my humble opinion, we are not worthy of being returned to represent the people of our districts.

To again give the Rules Committee the authority to blockade legislation would be a trend away from our democratic principles and would be very undesirable in one of the highest legislative bodies in the most democratic country in the world.

FREE DEBATE AND MAJORITY RULE IS THE ESSENCE OF DEMOCRATIC ACTION

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my opposition to the pending resolution, aimed at restoring the bottleneck veto power of the Committee on Rules, with all the vigor at my command.

My fundamental objection to this resolution, and to the procedure which it would restore, goes to the very heart of free, democratic government.

Free and open debate, followed by the open vote of the majority and adherence to that decision, is the very essence of the democratic processes of government.

Ever since the Committee on Rules was created by the House, and in spite of successive reforms, it has arrogated to itself powers which the House never intended to bestow.

Regardless of the party in power, the committee has exercised a power of veto over duly constituted legislative committees which has frequently defeated the fundamental principles on which not only our Government, but our two-party political system have been firmly and successfully founded.

POLITICAL MORALITY AT STAKE

My second most basic objection is based on a purely moral argument.

The Democratic Party is a party of minorities united on basic principles, which can be most aptly summed up as the greatest good for the greatest number consistent with good government and sound administration.

The one-word definition of those policies is "security"—freedom from fear, from hunger, from want, from oppression.

The people of the United States have trusted us with their security for 18 unbroken years of economic, social, and political progress.

If we now break faith with them, the people will repudiate us, and rightly so. One year and 20 days ago we gathered in this Hall as the Democratic caucus and we bound ourselves to the change in the rules of this venerable and honorable House which the resolution before us would repeal.

A DEGRADINGLY IMMORAL ACT

I am shocked—and the Nation is shocked—by the suggestion that now, by the whim of a few Members, we can lightly renounce our pledged word. For my part, I consider myself as firmly bound today by the decision of the caucus as I was on January 1, 1949, and I can only regard the wanton disregard of that decision as a degradingly immoral act.

By the same token, the Democratic Party went to the people in the presidential campaign of 1948 with a sound and specific platform of legislative and executive accomplishment. In my vocabulary, as in the vocabulary of our party leader, President Harry S. Truman, the planks of that platform were solemn pledges to the American people.

The obvious object of the resolution under debate is to defeat President Truman's legislative program, not by the democratic processes of open debate and public decision by a reasoning majority, but by the secret veto of a handful of willful men to whom their private passions are more important than the public benefit.

Mr. Speaker, the forces of liberty and progress have already won one resounding victory here today, and I am confident—absolutely confident—that when the roll is called on this resolution there will be the same great triumph for the people.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, it has been stated that this is an important vote, and that is true. I have a deep conviction about this matter that I assure you is disassociated from any particular measure or the consideration of any particular measure. I had that deep conviction when I spoke against the rule change on January 3 a year ago. I still have that deep conviction.

May I say to my colleagues, particularly on my side, who voted against the rule change at that time, that I cannot for the life of me see any reason why their vote on this occasion should be any different from what it was on the previous occasion. I understand the adroit tactics here trying to involve this question, which is fundamental and deep, with the problem of civil rights. Certainly those of us here who said originally that this matter should be postponed until after Monday, else the administration must take the responsibility, had a valid argument.

I say also that those of us who voted to adjourn, to put this matter over past Monday, have proven again that it is completely disassociated from the consideration of any civil-rights matter. The best evidence of that is that the author of the FEPC voted to adjourn.

There is talk here about a lot of things, and talk about deficits. I have seen the time when the Rules Committee was sitting on bills running into billions of dollars, that would have bankrupted the country.

Some reference has been made to the Eightieth Congress. One day when history is written it will yet be established that that Congress performed in the real interest of the country. But let me remind you of this, that it was the first Congress in 14 years that balanced the budget and had money to apply on the debt. A big part of the credit for that goes to the Rules Committee, and I ought to know something about it.

Of course we are confronted with this demand that comes from Mr. Truman. Mr. Truman at the moment is stubbornly, for political reasons, refusing to invoke the provisions of the law enacted by the Congress to settle the coal strike. And then he has the effrontery to come here and demand of us, my colleagues, that we yield to his demand in respect to the rules of the House of Representatives. The matter of the rules of the House of Representatives is one for this body to determine. I resent his failure to do what we said in the law should be done as I resent his determination, apparently, to usurp what I believe is the legislative function.

Reference was made by Mr. Truman again to the fact that this is designed to scuttle his program. Let me say to my colleagues on my side, no one can tell which of those measures may yet be voted on in this session of Congress. As far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote on any of them. But let me say here and now that there are a lot of them that should be defeated because they are unwise, ill-timed, beyond our ability to pay, reckless, extravagant, and socialistic. As far as I am concerned, if what he says is true, that there is in the adoption of this resolution a possibility of defeating some of those measures, then I want to support this resolution.

There has been a lot of bunk written about this awful bad Rules Committee. Why, the fact of the matter is that the Rules Committee was designed to be the creature of responsible leadership. It is no indictment of legislative committees to say that they attract to their individual membership members generally interested in the particular field in which that committee operates. Frequently they become special pleaders for a particular section, for a particular group, or a particular activity, or a particular segment of our population or our economy. For this reason it often happens that bills are reported which are clearly not favored by the majority of the membership of the House of Representatives. In such circumstances the Rules Committee is as necessary as is a traffic light on the busiest intersection in the whole country. Many times they get to be special pleaders. Many times bills are reported by legislative committees where the leadership knows they will be overwhelmingly defeated if they come to the floor of the House for a vote. Is it the function of the leadership to flood the floor of the House with all of these bills and waste the time of the House of Representatives so that we never can get to the matters which are really on the agenda? Why, all that sort of talk is pure nonsense. The fact of the business is that the House of Representatives can work its will if it wants to and we should have a Committee on Rules to see to it that the work of the Congress is properly expedited and carried on. Responsible leadership must have some implement of control. I am worried about a flood of bills that are not desired by the administration or by majority party leadership which may bankrupt the country. For myself, in this or in any Congress, I am convinced that the Rules Committee should have a very considerable measure of responsibility and control.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the House would agree to a postponement of action on the rule until next week. This would have made it possible to have the issue more clearly defined. The Democratic leadership has refused that adjournment. That makes it necessary for us to make the decision today.

Believing as I do firmly that the adoption of this rule is in the interest of orderly consideration of legislation and may well mean the preservation of the solvency of the country, I shall vote for it.

The adoption of this rule will not prevent legislation from coming to the floor. Through the vehicle of Calendar Wednesday, any committee can instruct its chairman to call up legislation. There is also the discharge rule, by which a majority of the House can always function through the simple expedient of signing a petition. The will of the majority of the House cannot be refused.

In my experience, legislation cannot be kept off the floor when a majority of the Congress really wishes it to be considered. Under the rules of 16 years under President Roosevelt, there was no difficulty in getting legislation to the floor.

The greatest issue before the country today is whether we are headed toward bankruptcy and eventually a socialist state. We are being spent and taxed into socialism. I shall do my best to resist that destructive trend. This rule, in my judgment, will materially aid in preventing that trend.

Therefore, I shall vote for it and I sincerely hope that Members will put their country ahead of self and vote for its adoption.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the consideration of this resolution is not partisan and should not be partisan. The issue involved is one that affects each and every one of us as a Member of the House of Representatives. I am elected by the people of my district and you are elected by the people of your district. As a Member of the House and as majority leader, I thoroughly respect each and every one of my colleagues, but, above all, I respect the fact that each and every one of my colleagues has been elected by a majority of the people of their own congressional district.

Yet the argument of my friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN], is "Yes, you have been elected, but give me the power to control you—give the power to six of us without regard to party, whether Democrat or Republican, to control the legislation which will come before the House of Representatives."

What my friend advocates is that a small minority of the Committee on Rules should control the House of Representatives.

The gentleman says the issue is socialism. Of course, that was raised in 1935 against the social-security legislation, which I helped to draft and which men like the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], who was and is now chairman of the committee, and others voted for. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] mentioned the Tennessee Valley Authority. I wonder how the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] feels now, when he knows that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] considers that socialistic. I wonder how the Representatives from the Tennessee Valley districts feel when they know that he would like to have control of the situation on any legislation relating to the Tennessee Valley, and if he did he would throttle it in the Rules Committee. In other words, you and I have no right to determine in our own minds whether legislation is socialistic or not. It all depends upon how my friend from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] and a few others feel. If they feel it is socialism, then it is, even if it may be the most reactionary type of legislation imaginable.

Boulder Dam would have been considered socialistic under his theory. I spoke for the first Bankhead Cotton Quota Act. My friends from the South asked me to do it. It was a close fight. It passed the House by only a few votes. I know why they wanted me to speak, coming from a city district. I did it. I did not consider that socialistic. But many of my friends on both sides did consider it socialistic, and there are some people today who consider any farm program to be socialistic.

The issue transcends FEPC. That is not involved. That is only a minor incident, because that can come up one way or another. But there are many other bills that cannot come up. There is a cotton bill from the Committee on Agriculture now. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], chairman of that committee, is present. Suppose that bill is tied up. Suppose there are four members of one party and three of our party—they may not be from the South, but coalitions can work in two or more ways. Suppose that happens, and suppose you did not have this 21-day rule, how are you going to get it up outside of a 218 discharge petition?

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; I yield to my friend.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman does not have to convince me. I am sure he knows that.

Mr. McCORMACK. Oh, I am referring to the bill.

Mr. COOLEY. The same argument of socialism might very well be made today against the Rural Electrification Administration, and the rural telephone program, and the soil-conservation districts, and many acts of Congress that have contributed to the welfare of agriculture.

Mr. McCORMACK. Exactly. And the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and many others.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] talks about authorization legislation. Our Congress has been passing authorization legislation since time immemorial. There is an omnibus river-and-harbor bill that goes through. It involves authorized appropriations of hundreds of millions of dollars, but it is a long-range proposition. We are appropriating this year on authority given 20 years ago, perhaps, in some cases.

Furthermore, the gentleman's argument falls to the ground when he talks about the Rules Committee screening and protecting us against expenditures, because expenditures are made by the Appropriations Committee. No appropriation bill from the Appropriations Committee comes before the Rules Committee. The Appropriations Committee reported out a forty-billion-odd-dollar appropriation bill. Not one of those items comes out of the Rules Committee or comes before the Rules Committee. So the argument of the gentleman from New York, it seems to me, falls to the ground.

On January 31, 1931, a former member of the Rules Committee, and former majority leader of this House, whom I admired as a colleague of mine, and who is still living and whom I admire very, very much, Bert Snell, in a speech in the House said this, in relation to the Rules Committee:

> Never by one single paragraph in the House Manual, not by a single sentence or a single word, as far as I know, has this House ever given the Rules Committee any substantive power to control legislation.
> It has not given the Rules Committee any substantive power to defeat legislation. * * * The Rules Committee is not a legislative committee. It is a very largely a procedure committee.

Yet, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] assure us that it is a legislative committee and not a procedure committee. But this former great Member of the House, Bert Snell, said:

> It is very largely a procedure committee. *

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Will not the gentleman wait until I complete the reading of this quotation?

Mr. COX. The gentleman attributes to me a belief I do not entertain, a statement I did not make. I understood, of course, that the Rules Committee was not a legislative committee.

Mr. McCORMACK. I will accept that correction; I will let it stand that way in the RECORD.

Continuing, Bert Snell said:

> The function of the Rules Committee * * * is to act in harmony with the majority sentiment of the majority of the House. * * * If the Rules Committee should start absorbing authority over legislative committees of this House, there would be real reason for the House rebelling against the authority of the Rules Committee. We have never tried to dictate to legislative committees, and if we did try it, there would be real reason for criticizing the members of the Rules Committee.

That is what happened; that is what will happen if this authority is given to the Rules Committee. In the Eightieth Congress many of my Republican friends tried to get a housing bill up. I spoke for it; you spoke for it, and you know it; you could not get it up. You did everything possible, you as individual Republican Members, to get the low-cost housing bill up, to get a rule from the Committee on Rules, but the committee never permitted the legislation to come up. All they did was to permit a vote under a suspension of the rules on something that did not include public housing or low-cost housing.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I will yield; yes.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman will recall that in this House the matter of public housing was carried by only five votes. In view of that, even had the Rules Committee reported it, it would not have carried in the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman has not contradicted a thing that I said.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. McCORMACK. My friend from Indiana says properly, and I agree with him, that the Rules Committee functions as a traffic light for the leadership; but it is not now a traffic light for the leadership. When the gentleman's party was in power I agree that it was.

The Rules Committee is not a legislative committee; it is not a policy committee; it is a procedure committee to cooperate with the leadership. I agree with my friend from Indiana. But my friend from Indiana disagrees with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] because he says it should have all power to stop socialism—his type, what he thinks is socialistic, not what you or I may think is socialistic or not socialistic.

My friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] insists that the Committee on Rules should have the power to prevent authorizing legislation that carries appropriations when the Committee on Appropriations is the committee that makes the actual appropriations; and furthermore, the Committee on Appropriations never even goes to the Committee on Rules.

So, without going into it any further, and to bring the debate to a close, the evidence is overwhelmingly against any change.

I hope the resolution will be defeated.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

All time has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCORMACK. This is a vote on the adoption of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The vote is on the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The vote is on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 183, nays 236, not voting 12, as follows:

NOT VOTING—12

Allen, Calif.	Gilmer	Sasscer
Bulwinkle	Lemke	Simpson, Pa.
Burdick	Macy	Smith, Ohio
Durham	Murphy	Vursell

So the resolution was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Simpson of Pennsylvania for, with Mr. Lemke against.

Mr. Macy for, with Mr. Burdick against.

Additional general pairs:

Mr. Gilmer with Mr. Vursell.

Mr. Allen of California with Mr. Smith of Ohio.

Mr. SCRIVNER changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion by Mr. MCCORMACK, a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANKIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include statements by the commander in chief and other officials of the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

ADJOURNMENT OVER AND PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and I am not going to object, I would like to ask the majority leader what he can tell us about the program for next week.

Mr. MCCORMACK. On Monday, of course, is the discharge rule under the 21-day rule. I have nothing else scheduled for next week, except that we have been advised there is a probability that House Joint Resolution 371 may be reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. That relates to income taxes of life-insurance companies for 1948 and 1949. If it is reported, I shall program that. Everything else depends upon what the Rules Committee may report out.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I have a motion pending to bring up the bill to restore 16,000 hospital beds. I expect to call that up.

Mr. MCCORMACK. That is a matter of discretion with the Speaker.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand, but that is a part of the program, and I just wanted the House to know that I will call it up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK]?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture may have until midnight tomorrow to file a report on House Joint Resolution 398, the cotton-acreage bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNETT of Florida asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution of the City Commission of Jacksonville, Fla.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] is recognized for 10 minutes.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE HOOVER COMMISSION

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire when, if ever, the Truman administration intends to put into effect the recommendations of the Hoover Commission.

The record to date indicates that the administration is conducting a stalling game. On a basis of what has been accomplished and what could have been accomplished, there appears to be no real intention whatever on the part of the Truman administration to carry out this much needed reorganization program, that we may have a more efficient government with substantial dollar savings for the taxpayers. It is time the American people became aware of this fact.

This administration is more interested in spending money than saving it. It is more interested in enlarging bureaucratic powers than in restricting them. It is more interested in increasing Federal jobs to reward the political faithful than in reducing the exorbitant number of persons now on the Federal pay roll.

The administration praises the Hoover Commission reorganization recommendations, but it has made no real effort to put them into effect. It has not translated this high praise into executive and legislative action. To avoid having to do what the American people want to have done to save tax dollars, the administration has adopted this deceptive stalling game.

Let us look at this record. It was over a year ago that the Commission submitted its reports to this Congress. The Bureau of the Budget estimated that the program involved 114 recommendations that could be effectuated by administrative action itself, that 124 required legislative action, and that 80 recommendations could be effectuated by reorganization plans.

This program was submitted over a year ago, but to date the President has sent to Congress only 8 of the possible 80 reorganization plans. And of the eight submitted, two of them constituted items the Congress had previously disapproved, such as creating a Department of Public Welfare and transferring certain functions of the Federal Security Administration with respect to unemployment compensation to the Department of Labor.

Not a single reorganization plan has been submitted to this session, and we have been here almost a month. In the President's message to Congress at the opening of the session he did not so much as even mention the Hoover Commission reorganization program. He made only some reference to certain phases of it in his budget message. Nor has the administration leadership brought before us thus far in this session a single bill to carry out recommendations that require legislative action.

Actions speak louder than words. Mr. Speaker, I question whether there is any real intention on the part of this administration to effectuate the Hoover Commission recommendations. In the meantime, while the administration carries on this stalling game, giving only lipservice to the program, our people are losing potential savings of several billions of dollars.

It strikes me as somewhat significant that it took the administration 6 months in the last session of Congress to secure enactment of the basic reorganization legislation, giving the President authority to propose reorganization plans subject to disapproval by Congress in 60 days. But the administration was only 16 days in the last session in having a law enacted to raise the salaries of the President, Vice President, the Speaker of the House, and the various heads of the departments and independent agencies.

In 16 days the administration secured passage of legislation to spend additional money, but it took around 180 days to secure passage of legislation to provide the means by which money might be saved.

Apparently those phases of the Hoover Commission recommendations which might involve certain additional expenditures for certain purposes, or certain additional bureaucratic powers are popular with this administration. But those phases of the recommendations which would result in economies or a limiting of certain bureaucratic activities are unpopular and are being ignored.

Mr. Speaker, let us have an end to this stalling game. I ask the President: Where are the reorganization plans to carry out the Hoover Commission program? It must be borne in mind that it takes 60 days after a plan is submitted to Congress before it becomes effective. I ask the leadership of the Congress: Where are the necessary legislative bills to carry out this important program?

While we are marking time, waiting for the President to send us reorganization plans and waiting for the legislative committees, particularly the Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments, to bring reorganization bills before the Congress, billions of dollars are lost to the American taxpayers and the national debt continues to grow.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 2 minutes.

REPUBLICANS, WE MISSED THE BOAT

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, from the press and the information which comes to our desks, it is apparent that our constituents are at last aware of the danger which confronts our country if the taxing and spending program of Mr. Truman is carried out. They also fear the adoption of socialized medicine, Federal aid to education, the extension of bureaucratic control, and left-wing proposals which pressure groups are attempting to force through Congress. The people fear socialism, which England adopted and which had it not been for United States dollars, would long ago have wrecked that country.

There are 435 Members of Congress—at least 300 of them active.

Each session thousands of bills are introduced. It is evident that if each Member introducing a bill could force even slight consideration of it the House would never be able to vote upon each bill introduced.

Hence it is that the House, like every other organization, is forced to adopt rules for the transaction of its business. What would happen if a corporation dispensed with its board of directors—permitted the stockholders to run the business? From the beginning, Congress has had what is known as standing committees, such as the Committees on Agriculture, on Commerce, on Labor, and so on down through the list—19 in all. When a bill is introduced, it is by the Speaker and the House Parliamentarian sent to the appropriate standing committee for consideration.

Members seek appointment to a particular committee because they have a special interest in legislation considered by that committee. For example, Members interested primarily in labor ask for a place on the Labor Committee. Those interested in agriculture seek to be placed on the Agriculture Committee. Veterans and those interested in legislation affecting veterans go to the Veterans Committee, and so on down through the list.

So it is. The regular standing committees of the House might be said to be, while not necessarily biased, at least primarily interested in the type of legislation handled by the appropriate committee.

If a committee considers legislation referred to it to have merit, its chairman then goes before the Rules Committee, whose function it has always been to screen legislation for House consideration.

Just as bills introduced by individual Members are referred to the appropriate House committee for screening, bills favorably approved by a standing committee go to the Rules Committee for a final screening.

The Rules Committee acts as a sort of check for the House. If it deems the legislation detrimental to the public welfare, it refuses to report it out for consideration. Some committee chairmen, and others especially interested in proposed legislation, say such action by the Rules Committee gags the House, results in thwarting the will of the House. That charge is not true, for the reason that there is a rule of the House which provides that if a majority of the membership—218 Members—sign a petition, the Rules Committee is discharged and the bill automatically comes to the House for a vote.

Last year, President Truman and his supporters, determined to put over his program, forced an amendment to the rules which provided that if the Rules Committee refused to report out a bill, the chairman of the House committee before which the bill was pending might bring it to the House for a vote. The purpose of that amendment was to bypass the Rules Committee, bypass a majority of the House, and put it within the power of any one of the 19 chairmen of the standing committees of the House to bring a bill to the floor.

The reason the President, his supporters, and those in favor of certain socialistic legislation, like socialized medicine, Federal aid to education, and similar measures, wanted to change the rule was because they knew that if a chairman could and would call before the House a bill which had behind it a powerful lobby and widespread propaganda, some Members who would not otherwise support it, might be induced to vote for it and so the legislation would slip through many times.

The Rules Committee of the Eighty-first Congress has before it bills calling for the expenditure of around $9,000,000,000. With a debt approaching $260,000,000,000 and a current annual deficit of more than five and a half billion, the Rules Committee has been sitting on proposed legislation calling for additional expenditures.

Some Members of Congress desire economy and efficiency and wish to put into effect the recommendations of the Hoover Commission. Some of us, realizing that the Rules Committee could be bypassed by the chairmen of the committees wishing to put over legislation which is socialistic in its nature, and calling for billions, proposed an amendment to the rules, taking that privilege of calling up a bill from the chairmen of the respective committees, but leaving it possible for the majority of the House Membership to bring to the floor any desired bill.

When the question came before the House today, the Speaker of the House and the majority leader, who, of necessity, must support President Truman's program, took the floor and vigorously opposed the change. They supported the President's spending program.

Strange as it may seem, many a Republican, who has loudly and frequently condemned Mr. Truman's tax-and-spend program, his plan for socialized medicine, for additional billions to Europe, when the show-down came, voted against changing the rule and by that action made the "come and get it," or more accurately the "wait and I will take it to you legislation," more easy of adoption.

The result is that the Speaker of the House, the majority leader, and a committee chairman can force the House to consider and vote upon any measure recommended by Mr. Truman, no matter how ruinous to our economy, how destructive of our individual freedom and liberty it may be.

Some of those who opposed the change argued "well, what is the harm—the House can still vote the bill down." Sure, the House can vote against an unsound bill but sometimes it will not. The record for the last few years shows that the House just will not resist spending. Santa Claus proposals, when loud and active pressure groups descend on Washington, either in person or by letter, go through.

It is all very well to tell constituents that we are in favor of the Hoover Commission recommendations. That we favor economy. The test comes when the chips are down and they were down today.

Truman, his supporters, and those who favor a left-wing program won. They won because at least 50 Republicans—perhaps 60 or 70—voted as requested by the Speaker and the majority leader. They won because while approximately 80 Democrats—I have not had time to check the record—deserted Mr. Truman—Republicans made up the loss.

Today we had an opportunity, not necessarily to stop Mr. Truman's program, but certainly an opportunity to stop a part of it—to slow up the whole of it—we missed the boat.

I voted for the change in the rules because I believe it to be the wish of my constituents to take advantage of every opportunity to cut down deficit spending, to slow up every proposed piece of legislation which drives us nearer to socialism, which to my mind is close kin to communism.

Perhaps telegrams we received yesterday and today had something to do with the vote. Here is a sample:

BENTON HARBOR, MICH., January 20, 1950.
Congressman CLARE E. HOFFMAN, House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Please be present Friday, January 20, and vote against repeal of the 21-day rule. Vote for repeal will be interpreted as vote against civil-rights legislation. When attempt is defeated we urge you be present Monday, January 23, and vote to bring H. R. 4453 to floor. We are depending on your cooperation in all crucial test votes involving civil rights.

RUSSELL BRUCE,
President, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Because the issue which was before us today is so clearly stated in an article by George Rothwell Brown in this morning's Times-Herald, I ask unanimous consent to include it as part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The article referred to is as follows:

POLITICAL PARADE

(By George Rothwell Brown)

President Truman, with a cynical effrontery without precedent in American history, has now openly and brazenly asserted the mastery of the Executive power over the legislative branch of the Government.

This is the sinister significance of this week's show-down battle in the House of Representatives over a resolution to restore the power of the Rules Committee.

"I am doing everything possible," said the President in a direct quotation, "to have that motion beaten when it comes up for consideration on the floor of the House."

Those shocking words, hitherto unfamiliar to American ears, represent the most flagrant and unconstitutional attempt at Executive usurpation of power since the adoption of the organic law of the Republic.

They mean that the President of the United States has viciously undertaken to dictate to the House of Representatives the making of its own rules.

No President in this country ever before thus publicly claimed a royal prerogative which went out of fashion in the English-speaking world with the overthrow of the Stuart kings and the Declaration of Independence.

The Constitution of the United States provides that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings."

The form of government it provides is strictly one of separate and independent branches, legislative, executive, and judicial.

A President of the United States has no more authority to tell the House of Representatives or the Senate what rules it may or may not adopt, than he has to tell the United States Supreme Court what decision to hand down in a pending case in which, as President, he might be interested.

As a matter of fact the rules of House and Senate are carefully designed to preserve the constitutional functions and independence of those bodies and to prevent any attempt at Executive encroachment.

The President's impudent interference in the vital question now agitating and dividing the Membership of the House is a deliberate and premeditated infringement upon congressional liberty of action under the Constitution.

It is a challenge to the high estate of the House and its freedom from all Executive penetration, and is enough in itself alone to inspire the House to repudiate this attempted invasion of one of its most sacred rights, by ignoring the President's pressure—and it is plenty—and restoring its powers to the Rules Committee.

The President's intemperate attack upon the constitutional integrity of the House of Representatives was made before a so-called civil-rights group that has been meeting in Washington.

This outfit made a great show of excluding all Communists who clamored for admission, but with transparent insincerity it has swallowed nearly the whole of what the Communists stand for.

But there is more than FEPC or civil rights involved in the revolt of conservative members of both parties in the House against Executive domination.

Notwithstanding, it was deprived of its traffic control of pending legislation on January 3, 1949, the Rules Committee, controlled by a bipartisan conservative majority, has been bottling up since the adjournment of the last session of Congress a prospective welfare state treasury raid involving eventually upwards of $15,000,000,000. Some estimates are much higher.

The continued solvency of the United States is hanging in the balance in the Rules Committee at this very moment.

If the floodgates of squandermania are opened this country is sunk.

Thus far the Rules Committee has been keeping back the threatening tide of unconscionable spending that could only end in national bankruptcy.

But in its present condition of limited power it cannot hold back this impending flood of red ink indefinitely.

Mr. Truman knows that if the conservative coalition in the House can rehabilitate the Rules Committee the scheme to socialize America cannot be carried any further this year.

From his point of view his design to browbeat the House into submission to his will is perfectly understandable.

Aided by the powerful labor dictators who are deluging members with their demands and orders, the President is pouring it on.

Will the Republican minority play Truman's game?

It is up to them.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. EBERHARTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two editorials.

Mr. HAND asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LEMKE (at the request of Mr. D'EWART) for an indefinite period while attending the funeral of his brother.

SENATE BILL REFERRED

A bill of the Senate of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 2319. An act to promote world peace and the general welfare, national interest, and foreign policy of the United States by providing aid to the Republic of Korea; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 49 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Monday, January 23, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

MONDAY, JANUARY 23, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, at this altar of prayer we would be sure of Thy presence ere pressing duty leads us back to a noisy, crowded way. Speak to our waiting hearts words of forgiveness, of empowering, and of cleansing, that as servants of Thine and of the people we may the more worthily serve this great day as the hearts of men are stirring with the throb of deep desire. May the great causes that concern Thy human family, the selfless ministries that heal the world and rebuild it, the attitudes that create good will and make abiding peace possible at last, command the utter allegiance of our labor and our love. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. GILLETTE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 20, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] is unavoidably detained.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. DARBY] is absent by leave of the Senate.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] is absent on official business.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] is absent by leave of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S TAX POLICY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 451)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read by the legislative clerk and referred to the Committee on Finance.

(For President's message, see today's proceedings of the House of Representatives on pp. 769–772.)

MEETINGS OF COMMITTEES DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. MCCARRAN, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Judiciary was authorized to meet this afternoon and tomorrow during the sessions of the Senate.

On request of Mr. MAYBANK, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Banking and Currency was authorized to meet this afternoon during the session of the Senate.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. THOMAS of Utah was excused from attendance on the session of the Senate on Tuesday next.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, without losing the right to the floor, I may yield to Senators for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions, the presentation of petitions and memorials, and the submission of routine matters for the body of the RECORD, and for the Appendix, without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair will recognize Senators for the purposes stated, without taking the Senator from Iowa off the floor.

REPORT OF ACTIVITIES OF VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the activities of the Veterans' Administration, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1949, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION—AMENDMENTS

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Is it in order at this time to move an amendment in the nature of a substitute for Senate Joint Resolution 25, the so-called equal-rights amendment, to establish the so-called equal-rights status of men and women?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in order at this time, because we are engaged in the transaction of routine business, under unanimous consent.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I had understood, Mr. President, that the consideration of the equal-rights amendment had already been made the order of the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the unfinished business, but, under unanimous consent, Senators are now being recognized for insertion in the RECORD of routine matters which are ordinarily encompassed in what we call the morning hour. It will be in order, if the Senator gets the floor at any time following the Senator from Iowa, to make his motion.

Mr. KEFAUVER subsequently said: Mr. President, I send to the desk, to lie on the table and to be printed for the information of the Senate, certain amendments to Senate Joint Resolution 25, and I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be changed in form to a bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request to change the form of the joint resolution to a bill should properly be made if and when the amendments are agreed to.

In the meantime, the amendments will lie on the table and be printed.

PROTEST AGAINST WHEAT-ACREAGE REDUCTION

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I have received a resolution which was adopted at a mass meeting of farmers held in the Memorial Building, New England, N. Dak., on January 7, 1950, which reads as follows:

"Wherefore spring wheat is the surest grain crop which can be grown in this area and is the backbone of the local farming industry; and

"Wherefore farming is practically the only industry in this State; and

"Wherefore many farmers will not be able to even seed this 1949 summer-fallowed acres to wheat if they comply with the Government program: Therefore be it

"Resolved by this meeting, That we strenuously protest the wheat acre cut as handed down by the Department of Agriculture; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each of North Dakota Senators and Representatives in Congress and to the Secretary of Agriculture."

The above resolution was passed at a mass meeting of farmers held in the Memorial Building, New England, N. Dak., January 7, 1950. There were 300 present at the meeting and the resolution passed unanimously.

C. M. CHRISTENSEN,
Chairman.
EARL CRUNDLE,
Secretary.

I might say, Mr. President, that I have been requested to bring this resolution to the attention of the Senate, and ask that it be appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

MERIT PROMOTIONS IN THE POSTAL SERVICE

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution dealing with merit promotions in the postal service which was adopted unanimously by Local 483, National Federation of Post Office Clerks, in December 1949, at the People's Center, Jersey City, N. J.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution requesting support of H. R. 5260, merit promotions in the postal service

Whereas the Post Office Department has no fair, uniform, equitable procedure for the advancement of employees of the field service to supervisory positions; and

Whereas the lack of such a procedure prevents eligible employees from competing openly and fairly for such positions; and

Whereas the present method of selection of supervisors gives insufficient recognition to the long years of competent service of capable employees; and

Whereas throughout the years there have been numerous cases in the postal field service where capable, senior employees have been denied the opportunity to compete, and as a direct result of such practices senior competent employees have been passed over; in some cases their qualifications not even considered, and the appointments awarded junior employees; and

Whereas such morale-destroying practices cause resentment among employees with resultant impairment of discipline and efficiency; and

Whereas local 483 has always maintained that the adoption of such a method, mandatory upon the Post Office Department to enforce, would promote a harmonious relationship among all concerned and contribute to high employee morale and thereby benefit the postal service: Therefore be it

Resolved, That local 483, NFPOC, go on record as being wholeheartedly in favor of the enactment of H. R. 5260 into law; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the national, New Jersey State federation, members of the House and Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committees, AFL affiliates, and other locals requesting their support in the passage of this much-needed legislation.

ZYGFRED OSIEWICZ,
President.
ROLAND H. CUNNINGHAM,
Secretary.

RESOLUTIONS OF BLUE STAR MOTHERS OF AMERICA

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the Blue Star Mothers of America, Inc., convened in national convention in the Hotel New Yorker, from October 31, 1949, through November 3, 1949.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas an order has been issued by the Department of the Navy closing the Long Beach Navy Shipyard and retaining personnel sufficient only to guard and maintain the premises; and

Whereas the Long Beach Navy Shipyard was the only shipyard singled out for complete inactivities, thereby losing highly skilled personnel that it has taken years to assemble; and

Whereas this Long Beach Shipyard has contributed and is contributing to the national defense and is ranked as the most efficient of the shipyards; and

Whereas present world conditions are such that it would indicate that all agencies of national defense be maintained at the highest levels; and

Whereas the people of the community are acting in good faith to relieve land subsidence as recommended by the Navy; and

Whereas families of 5,700 men will suffer, including more than 3,500 veterans and with aircraft and other defense industries being moved inland, the welfare agencies of the Long Beach community will not be able to handle problems: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the Blue Star Mothers of America, Inc., by the adoption of this resolution signify that we desire to be on record as being emphatically opposed to the closure of the Long Beach Navy Shipyard; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Navy, the Honorable CLYDE DOYLE, Member of Congress, and to the Subsidence Remedial Council.

Whereas Blue Star Mothers of America, have been embarrassed by another group with a similar name, which was listed as subversive by Attorney General Tom Clark; and

Whereas taking the oath of loyalty to our country is a privilege which would be welcomed by any loyal American: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That each member of our organization be asked to sign a loyalty oath and any person making application for membership in Blue Star Mothers of America, Inc. be requested to sign this loyalty oath.

Whereas among those that served overseas in the armed forces of the United States in World War II, a large number have officially been declared missing in action; and

Whereas it is strongly believed that many of such former servicemen are in fact now being held as prisoners of war behind the iron curtain countries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That in regular meeting assembled, do hereby request the Department of State of the United States of America to use its entire resources to search out, locate, and return to their native land these former servicemen, and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to both Senators from the State of California and our Representative in Congress.

Whereas many instances have come to the attention of Blue Star Mothers in their work with veterans, that a great amount of red tape and technicalities are involved when attempting to secure medical attention or hospitalization for veterans, and valuable time is lost trying to procure the information that seems to be required before a veteran may be admitted to a hospital or receive medical attention: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Blue Star Mothers of America, Inc., here assembled, go on record as protesting this attitude and procedure and ask Congress to take steps to eliminate this abuse.

Whereas many orphans of veterans are unable to procure advanced education, as they no doubt would have been able to had their fathers not made the supreme sacrifice: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Blue Star Mothers of America, Inc., go on record as favoring that educational benefits that the veteran might have been eligible for may be granted to the children of said deceased veteran, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to all Congressmen of the United States.

Resolved by the Blue Star Mothers of America, Inc., assembled in convention in New York, N. Y., November 1949:

Whereas a knowledge of government—local, State, and national—is highly important to good citizenship and performing the duties and opportunities of citizenship in many ways, particularly—

How our Government operates.

What the provisions of government are.

The value of our form of government by comparison.

How a citizen of our country may take his part in the different levels of our Government activities.

The duties and privileges of a good citizen.

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States is hereby petitioned and urged, and this organization will follow up on securing, the placing of the teaching of civics in the regular course of study in the schools of the Nation for not less than four full and complete years in the first eight grades of all school and/or high schools of such nature, and recognized as acceptable for credits, and the building of a better-informed and more active and responsible citizenship of the coming generation.

PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR ADVERTISING—PETITIONS

Mr. DONNELL. I present for reference to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, certain petitions, all of which have been received by me and refer to S. 1847. On said petitions are the names of approximately 9,703 petitioners. The petitioners in some of said petitions request that their Senators and Representatives in Congress use their influence and vote for the passage of a bill to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic-beverage advertising in interstate commerce and the broadcasting of alcoholic-beverage advertising over the radio. The petitioners in others of said petitions urge their Senators and Representatives in Congress to secure the prompt enactment of laws which will withdraw the protection of interstate commerce from liquor advertising crossing State lines. The petitioners in others of said petitions petition for passage of S. 1847. The petitioners in others of said petitions petition me to work and vote for the passage of S. 1847. The petitioners in another of said petitions ask me to vote for S. 1847. The petitioners in another of said petitions petition my support of S. 1847. The petitioners in others of said petitions request that the junior Senator from Missouri and I use our influence and vote for S. 1847.

I also present to the Senate for reference to the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce four letters which have been received by me. One of said letters, which is dated January 9, 1950, indicates the writer to be in favor of the bill referred to by the writer as now pending in Congress forbidding the advertising of intoxicating liquors of any kind over the radio, or in any other way. The second of said letters indicates the writer thereof to favor S. 1847. The 14 signers of the third of said letters request that I vote for—to quote the signers—"the bill to prohibit the advertising of intoxicating drinks." The fourth of said letters states that the 11 persons, the name and address of each of whom appear thereon, are very heartily in favor of the passage of S. 1847.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions and letters will be received and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ALLOCATION PLAN AS APPLIED FOR CONTROL OF FARM PRODUCTS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the allocation plan as applied for the control of farm products, prepared by H. S. Casey Abbott, in 1931.

There being no objection, the plan was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ALLOCATION PLAN AS APPLIED FOR THE CONTROL OF FARM PRODUCTS

(By H. S. Casey Abbott)

This article is a compilation of notes made during the past 3 years by the writer covering various phases of the farm problem.

The machinery for the carrying out of this plan is already set up in the form of the Federal Farm Board. No further appropriations are necessary for its operation.

PERTINENT FACTS

There are in the United States 6,000,000 farms which today can be considered as food manufacturing plants, operating at a loss. This is a condition which must be rectified.

This plan attempts to consolidate their efforts and enable them to function as a unit of industry—making a profit which in the aggregate is sufficient to pull us out of the bread line and put us back on the road to prosperity.

They ask Government direction but not Government operation.

Remember we could do without every man in industry except the American farmer. The price of farm products is directly reflected in the purchasing power of the majority of the American people.

Our problem must be solved within our largest basic industry and we must begin at the bottom and build rather than attempt to relieve this depression from the top down.

No industry has been so grossly neglected or abused by the business world as has the American farm, yet, this industry can be brought back to prosperity quicker than any other because of the simple fact that earth, sun, air, and water and not purchased materials are the main factors in producing farm factory products.

The American farmer is the basic and biggest consumer in our country today. The prosperity of 90 percent of our industries depend upon the prosperity of the farm and the farmer's dollar. His is the greatest number and once he is prosperous our country is prosperous.

We are still basically an agricultural Nation and we will continue to be this for many years to come. The American farmer asks only for a plan, at the expense of no one, which will enable him to gage his production according to prospective demand. Overproduction has meant poverty for him. He only asks that he be reasonably prosperous along with his fellow Americans. His prosperity means the prosperity of the entire Nation.

There are today approximately 26,000,000 Americans living on farms. There are directly dependent, in a business way, on each family on the farm, a family and a half in our rural communities, thereby making 70,000,000 of our people absolutely dependent upon the price of farm products.

PLAN FOR STABILIZING THE FARMING INDUSTRY

This is the general plan which should be used in making the allocation system effective.

Allocation shall be on an acreage basis strictly.

The Federal Reserve bank, the Federal intermediate credit bank, and the Federal land bank to agree on a common policy regarding finances for the farmer and attitude toward those financing the farmer, either directly or indirectly, with the idea of enforcing indirectly or if necessary directly the allocation system outlined below. Their policy to be transmitted through all channels down to the local or country banks and the local merchants and through those banks to the businessmen doing business with the farmers.

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States to line up with the above program and to transmit through their various channels of putting out information, the same program.

The merchants and manufacturers associations and buyers associations to do the same.

The Agricultural Department of the United States to make available to the Farm Board all statistical information necessary to establish the needs of the country, both for domestic consumption and export trade, of products of the farm for a period of 2 years with the view of working out a definite allocation system. This to be revamped from period to period.

The Federal Farm Board to ask each State to create an allocation commission and the State governors to create an allocation commission in each county and the supervisors of each county to designate districts and create in each district an allocation commission. If possible the latter commission to be selected by the farmers themselves.

A system of warehouse control, through bonding, to be set up by the Federal Farm Board. Unnecessary long hauls of farm products to be eliminated wherever possible.

Lands shall be classified as active and inactive. The inactive shall be classed as reserve and as 5-, 10-, and 20-year inactive. The reserve lands shall be the marginal lands which shall be cropped or not cropped each year in accordance with the allocation plan. The plan for the balance shall be directed by the Agricultural Department in conjunction with the Forestry Department to establish and carry out the general policy of reforestation, regrassing or rebrushing of all developed lands which have been in crop the previous year under the above classification but which are not to be cropped under the allocation system, employing in this plan as much local labor as is possible. The above plan to be financed entirely by the Federal Government.

The State governors to declare an emergency to exist and take proper steps for the elimination of taxes on all land set aside under the above classification. These taxes to be rescinded so long as this land is kept out of cultivation—or if such a plan is not practicable and it is wished to keep the plan entirely away from the necessity of political and legislative action, the allocation board to request the supervisors of counties in the United States to reclassify farm lands for tax purposes, making land retired from production under the allocation plan bear a minimum tax. Of necessity the governors of States involved should be asked to cooperate with the plan.

In conjunction with the Federal Reserve bank and the warehouse system to be established, the Federal Farm Board to create through loans, a surplus of all staple farm products, storing this so that in case of shortage they will be able to feed products to the market and keep conditions and prices normal, and at the same time, through their loan and warehouse system, they will be able to pick up any surplus which might occur and hold it until the next year's allocation shall have absorbed it. Allocations to be submitted yearly and seasonally.

No money is to be advanced for the development of land, except in irrigated districts for a period of 5 years.

Associations to be treated the same as individuals under the allocation system.

All loans to be handled through banks connected with the Federal Reserve System and under the control thereof.

BENEFITS OF THE ABOVE SYSTEM

The flow of finances and credit to the farmer is regulated and the allocation system indirecty enforced.

The supply and flow of farm products for and to the market is controlled and regulated.

Semi-Government control of warehouses through bonding and the creating of an established surplus will act as a governor of supply and the price of any product can be regulated by use of this surplus.

The reforestation program eliminates land from possible cultivation until needed; assists materially in doing away with the flood hazard and erosion; builds up an underground water supply; picks up and uses a good portion of the present idle labor; removes the temptation to put this land into cultivation, contrary to the wishes of the allocation board, and at the same time, creates a large amount of growing timber and pasture land which will be of increasing value to the country at large as well as a future monetary value to the individual owner of the land.

The elimination of taxation on such land spreads the burden equally over the entire population of the United States and is an incentive to the farmer to work under the allocation system.

The allocation system, as a whole, working through the above channels automatically cuts down acreage in cultivation, and in so doing establishes a firm control on the amount of farm products to be handled, placing them under semigovernmental control.

With the regulation of supply and the setting up of a surplus, demands can be satisfied without any drastic change in price from year to year and the farmer can be assured of a fair price for his products.

NOTE.—The formation of associations and cooperative selling of products should follow rather than go before such a system, for in order to have associations a success a control must be exercised of supply. I fully believe, however, that the allocation system will make unnecessary the formation of associations and if it does this, it will leave undisturbed the great mass of Americans who are engaged in buying and selling farm products. Certainly with Government direction under the allocation system and a warehoused surplus, controlled by loans from the banks, any unfair or unethical move on the part of the middleman can be controlled and checked.

The Federal Farm Board acting as an allocation board can immediately set up the above and it should be possible to make this a working plan within a period of 6 months. No credit already given need be disturbed and the surplus already established can be used as a predetermined surplus until the price of farm products is stabilized.

I would not attempt to regulate the flow of products from irrigated districts unless such action would seem necessary for the carrying out of the general plan. This latter because bonded indebtedness for improvements such as dams and carrying canals makes it impractical unless a moratorium be declared.

FARM PROBLEM

This article is the result of 18 years' experience in cotton growing and marketing and actual contact with the business and ramifications thereof. It will be noted that the writer has very little faith, if any, in associations, especially so far as their beneficial effect is concerned, when they attempt to handle basic crops. He feels that the first regulation must be acreage and that a restricted production is better than an attempt to establish price, and will perforce regulate prices, providing orderly marketing is arranged. In the natural course of events therefore, what was written a year ago is effective today.

Under the plan presented by the cotton members of the Federal Farm Board the cotton farmer, if he intended to stay in business, was to be forced into an association's hands in order to borrow money with which to operate and pay his bills. If he joined, his product was pooled and the mass mistake became his mistake. He ceased to be a businessman and became a simple cog in a huge machine impersonally governed.

Contrary to popular belief, no cotton-growing association or wheat-growing association can effectually represent the wish of the farmer. It can only represent the wish of the directors. It is entirely impersonal in character and consists of hired men holding positions which are more or less political in nature because they are beholden to the mass vote of the farmers or to the influence wielded by this or that director and as a consequence the price received for the farmer's product is not the result of keen competition but is the result of mechanical marketing.

If the Government would confine their efforts to regulating acreage and provide orderly marketing, the farmer's problem would be solved. We men who are actually in the business feel that it should be taken up from a farmer's standpoint and not from the a standpoint of working out an idea, which in practically every instance, has been a failure.

The main cause of the lack of prosperity in the farming industry, when considered as a whole, can be laid to overproduction and to the fact that the farmer is forced, because of economic and operating conditions and his inability to finance himself, to dump his products. Each year he plants with very little idea of price and his returns depend absolutely on market conditions, supply and demand. Cooperative associations for marketing basic products have been founded, apparently to assist the farmer, but if they are scrutinized carefully, except in few instances, it will be found that such associations are not economical from a commercial standpoint and cannot compete with the ordinary middleman except by making the farmer absorb an increased cost of selling, which is a direct loss. In my opinion they are uneconomic and do away with competitive marketing, which we must have if the farmer is to be prosperous. This does not apply to specialties, or to products of which there is a limited production, for associations in these cases have had marked success.

The middleman cannot be cut out of business in the United States. He is a heavy consumer, exists in every form of trade and is a vital factor in the distribution and marketing of products in all forms of business. Cooperative associations are supposed to do away with this man but as stated above, there are too many evils connected therewith for them to succeed.

The furnishing of money by the Government to such associations is only adding fuel to the flame and assisting in the creation of a situation which is socialistic and economically unsound.

Farming, if considered as a whole, is the biggest business in the United States and yet has had less help from our Government than any other form of business. Let us consider its operation in comparison to, say, the steel business. If the price of steel goes down, mills are closed, stocks are lowered, and a general retrenchment takes place. Because of the fact that each farm is an individual factory and each one holds a man and family or several of them, who are dependent for their livelihood upon the operation thereof and also that his crop, once planted, is out of his control, makes it impossible for the farmer to stop production or to shorten production under existing conditions. Yet his ability, in producing, to conform to the market demand is really the only thing that will help farming financially.

The solution of the problem which confronts us today is not difficult if the farmers can be brought together and handled as a unit under the guidance of our Government. It does not require any tremendous outlay of money on the Government's part in the form of loans. Easy money will only lead to overproduction and the development of more land, and will be forthcoming after the crops have passed out of the hands of the farmers and benefit the speculator only. Nor does it require the putting into effect of socialistic ideas or the assuming of a paternalistic attitude on the part of the Government toward this industry. Such an attitude would ultimately ruin not only the farmer but the country as well.

We farmers are businessmen, and if we are such we recognize that our plants or factories are too big for the present requirements of this country. The solution of the entire problem, to my way of thinking, is as follows, so far as the nonperishable crops are concerned:

Let the Government appoint a Federal Farm Commission, which will have at its beck and call, all of the statistical information both present and near future as to crop production and the needs of the world for our products. The Agricultural Department of the Government can furnish this. Each State should have an agricultural commission, and each county one also; each county to be divided into districts where the farmers themselves will organize and appoint their own commission.

The Government sets up and establishes the future needs of the country over a period of, say, 2 years in advance, based on past 10-year production. They send out, as the time for each crop in various parts of the country approaches an allocation based on local past productions, stating how much of each crop should be planted in that particular State. The State commission in turn allocates their commitment to the counties and the counties in turn allocate to the district, and the district commission allocates the commitment to the farmer. The allocations are also based on average past production.

The Government places under governmental control, through bonding, warehouses in various parts of the country. These are to be used for storage of the surplus products to be purchased or controlled by loans through the Federal Reserve member banks with a rotating fund set aside by Congress to take care of two conditions. In case of a surplus it can be stored by the Government until the next year's allocation is made and retrenchment provides a market for the same. A certain predefined surplus should always be carried. In case of crop failure, this surplus will be available for the stabilization of the market in order that the consumer be not forced to pay an exorbitant price for farm products. In this way your farmer is protected and is practically guaranteed a fair price for his products, and your consumer is also protected against the increase of the price due to shortage. This fund and the warehouses can also be used to assist in an orderly marketing of crops and do away with dumping.

Tied into this, there should be a plan of reforestation covering the entire United States. This is to be entirely financed by the Government. It is generally known today that the ground level of the domestic water supply all over the United States is lowering very rapidly. So much land has been developed and so many forests have been cut away that the rapid run-off of rain water and snow are fast destroying vast areas in the United States and each year makes the flood menace greater. Tremendous floods all over the country are simply a prelude and a warning to us that this must be stopped and reforestation is the only proper solution. Ultimately we will be forced to do this anyway and if each farmer knows that when he cuts his acreage that the portion which he temporarily abandons will be put to beneficial use where it will in a measure pay its way and ultimately be of great gain, he will look on such a proposition with more favor.

Necessarily if the farmers do not work together and do not voluntarily come into the above-described organization, it will not succeed but the farmer should be placed on his own and the Government should not attempt to step into the farming picture at all unless the farmers, as a whole, are willing to voluntarily help themselves to this extent.

There will be more or less bootlegging of farm products to contend with. Individuals will say that they will not accept the allocations of the local commission. This can easily be taken care of if the local organization, local bankers, and local buyers work with the district commission. Such bootleg products will naturally be distressed products and the man who raises them will be forced to accept a much lower price than his neighbor who is cooperating and working under the organization plan. The entire plan should not be forced on the farmer but should be so organized that his association therewith, under a term contract, should be voluntary. In this and this way alone each year, as the market contracts and expands, the farmer will be able to plan his operations accurately. Necessarily your land speculators are going to be hurt, but if no further development of farm land was undertaken for a period of 10 years, the industry as a whole would be much better off. So far as the development of our irrigation areas is concerned these are specialty areas where farming of perishable crops make such development profitable and noninterfering with the above plan. They can be mainly devoted to the above or to the growing of alfalfa which needs no governing factor. Necessarily the above plan can only deal with basic crops, such as wheat, corn, cotton, and smaller grains and nonperishable crops. Everything else must take its chance in the open market unless the growers of these products which cannot be stored ask that the Government provide them with a similar organization. The above plan keeps the Government out of the farming business which they will go into just as sure as they start advancing money to stabilize price or to cooperative associations in an attempt to assist the farmer.

The banks all over the country have tried this and today in most parts of the country a loan for the growing of crops, unless it is backed up by liquid security, is a hard thing to get. It can be readily seen that the above system once working will not disturb the business position of any man connected with the farming industry today. The middleman will keep on buying farm products, only the prices will be more stabilized. The reforestation program will take care of whatever surplus labor is created because of the retrenchment or sizing down of farming activity.

Such a system once organized and operating will put the farmer back where his growing crops will be a banking risk and he can get money to operate on without paying penalties and premiums which in many localities he is forced to carry. I believe that cheap money to the operating farmer is unknown today unless, as stated above, he has liquid security. In conjunction with the banking end of farming there could be arranged a form of crop insurance which would insure the crops against natural hazards. Such a form exists in California today and is widely used in the citrus industry. This would provide additional security to the banker for his loan in case of a loss and would enable the farmer to keep his farm and equipment free from debt in case of failure. If the farmer can once get in the position of being a bankable risk and be assured that the market will not be glutted with the products which he is raising so that he is not constantly faced with the bogey of overproduction and the uncertainty of price, his business will be as prosperous as that of any other man and the gradual increase of population and demand for his products will in turn bring his entire farm back into production. No business can be prosperous where the basic producer is face to face with a price variation up and down of from 30 to 50 percent yearly, yet that is exactly where the farmer is today. Supply and demand is the final governing factor in any business and once this is taken hold of and controlled in the agricultural branch of this country's business the farmer will be prosperous.

GAS RATES IN JACKSONVILLE, FLA.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from William M. Madison, city attorney, of Jacksonville, Fla., together with a resolution adopted by the City Commission of the City of Jacksonville, relating to the gas rates in that city.

There being no objection, the letter and resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEGAL DEPARTMENT,
CITY OF JACKSONVILLE, FLA.,
January 18, 1950.

HON. SPESSARD L. HOLLAND,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HOLLAND: Recently the Federal Power Commission made three members of its staff available to the City Commission of the City of Jacksonville, which is the regulatory body authorized to establish fair and reasonable gas rates in the city of Jacksonville. This service of the Federal Power Commission and its staff members has been of material assistance to the city of Jacksonville in gas-rate proceedings before the city commission and the Florida Railroad and Public Utilities Commission. These services have been made possible because Federal law permits the FPC to render this aid to city and State regulatory commissions on a repay basis.

The City Commission of the City of Jacksonville has adopted the resolution, a true copy of which, attested by Mr. Earle E. Jones, secretary of the city commission, is herewith enclosed, expressing its appreciation to the Federal Power Commission and its staff for this valuable service to the city of Jacksonville, and I have been directed by the city commission to forward you said true copy and to respectfully request you to obtain permission to have it inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in order that other Members of Congress may know of this excellent assistance which is being rendered by the Federal Power Commission to city and State regulatory bodies.

Sincerely yours,
WILLIAM M. MADISON,
City Attorney.

Whereas at the request of the City Commission of the City of Jacksonville the Federal Power Commission made available to the city three of its staff experts in proceedings instituted by the city commission to fix a fair and reasonable rate for the sale of manufactured gas to consumers thereof in the city of Jacksonville by the Jacksonville Gas Corp. and on the appeal by said gas corporation from the action of the city commission to the Florida Railroad and Public Utilities Commission; and

Whereas the services rendered by said staff experts, Messrs. Edward L. Dunn, Carl T. Kallina, and Robert Simonds, have been of invaluable assistance to the city of Jacksonville and to consumers of manufactured gas in this city, and have contributed in a large measure toward the rendition of an order by the Florida Railroad and Public Utilities Commission reducing present rates for the sale of manufactured gas in the city of Jacksonville: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the City Commission of the City of Jacksonville, That the grateful appreciation of this commission be extended to the Federal Power Commission for the assistance rendered to the city of Jacksonville in the aforesaid proceedings to establish a just and reasonable rate for the sale of manufactured gas to consumers thereof in the city of Jacksonville, Fla.; and be it further

Resolved, That the sincere thanks of this commission are hereby extended individually to Messrs. Edward L. Dunn, Carl T. Kallina, and Robert Simonds for their untiring, efficient, and valuable services rendered to the city of Jacksonville in the aforesaid proceedings; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be transmitted by the secretary of this commission to the Federal Power Commission and to Messrs. Edward L. Dunn, Carl T. Kallina, and Robert Simonds.

A true copy.
Attest:

EARLE E. JONES,
Secretary, City Commission.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following report of a committee was submitted:

By Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

S. 2520. A bill authorizing the issuance of a patent in fee to Walter Tebo; with amendments (Rept. No. 1235).

ECONOMIC POWER OF LABOR ORGANIZATIONS—REPORT OF BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE (S. REPT. NO. 1234)

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, the Banking and Currency Committee held hearings from July 5 to August 26, 1949, upon the Economic Power of Labor Organizations. Your committee took this action under its general powers derived from the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946. However, the committee has determined that if a remedy is needed, the more direct approach would be through a specific amendment of the antitrust laws. Therefore, I submit a report including minority views, and I ask unanimous consent that it be referred to the Judiciary Committee for its study and consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received and printed, and, without objection, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as requested by the Senator from South Carolina. The Chair hears no objection.

REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON ECONOMIC REPORT ON MONETARY, CREDIT, AND FISCAL POLICIES (S. DOC. NO. 129)

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document, with illustrations, the report of the subcommittee of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, on monetary, credit, and fiscal policies. It is a subcommittee report, and is the first of four studies authorized under Senate Concurrent Resolution 26 of the last session. It is to be regarded solely as the expression of view of the members of the subcommittee. It has not been reviewed by the full committee.

I consulted the chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration. The report comprises 50 pages, and I think falls within the rule.

I may say, Mr. President, that a number of requests have already come to the offices of the committee for quantities of this report, and I am asking that it be put on public sale by the Superintendent of Documents. I am informed that the sale price will be 20 cents a copy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report submitted by the Senator from Wyoming will be printed as a Senate document.

ECONOMIC INDICATORS—MONTHLY PUBLICATION NOW ON SALE

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, in this connection I think the Senate might be interested to know that copies of materials published by the joint committee generally have been in increasing demand through the country. Requests for publication, by mail, wire, telephone, or personal call, are currently running at over 50 per day. On the occasion of issuing the new report, the figure usually exceed 100 requcsts per day. Since October 1949 the committee has distributed to its mailing list and on special request nearly 18,000 committee documents. This is exclusive of the distribution by the Superintendent of Documents of those publications which have been put on sale. It has been the policy of the chairman of the committee to provide for the sale of as many of these documents as possible, in order that the Government may receive an income from their circulation. That was the thought I had in mind last year when I introduced the bill to provide for the publication of the monthly document entitled "Economic Indicators." The publication is for sale by the Superintendent of Documents at $1.75 a year, and the demand is so great that it is now selling at the rate of more than 2,000 copies a month. Other documents of the committee have sold in lots as high as 400 or 500, for use by schools, State and local government agencies, trade associations, large corporations, individuals, and other public interest groups. Economic Indicators is available, of course, without charge to all Members of the Congress, monthly upon its issue. The publication usually consists of the 32 pages, with charts and supporting statistics gathered by Government agencies in an objective way from the best available sources. Business, industry, agriculture, and consumers are all finding valuable information in the document. The demand which is developing for it shows the wide interest among the people of the country in the economic problem.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. TYDINGS

S. 2911. A bill to authorize the President to appoint Lt. Col. Charles H. Bonesteel as Executive Director of the European Coordinating Committee under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, without affecting his military status and perquisites; to the Committee on Armed Services.

(Mr. ROBERTSON introduced Senate bill 2912, to protect trade and commerce against unreasonable restraints by labor organizations, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. MARTIN:

S. 2913. A bill for the relief of Michail Ioannou Bourbakis; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. HENDRICKSON (for himself and Mr. SMITH of New Jersey) introduced Senate bill 2914, to authorize the transfer of funds allocated for expenditure in cooperation with the New Jersey State Highway Department on State Highway Route No. 100 to State Parkway Route No. 4, which was referred to the Committee on Public Works, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. PEPPER:

S. 2915. A bill to exempt admissions to activities of educational institutions from the tax on admissions; to the Committee on Finance.

(Mr. MAGNUSON introduced Senate bill 2916, to amend the National Security Act of 1947 to provide for the review of procurement plans and policies of the Military Establishment which involve the relocation of industrial plants and personnel, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and appears under a separate heading.)

(Mr. JOHNSON of Texas introduced Senate Joint Resolution 148, to provide for the designation of the Air Engineering Development Center as the Arnold Engineering Development Center, which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and appears under a separate heading.)

(Mr. KNOWLAND introduced Senate Joint Resolution 149, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States imposing a limitation with respect to taxation of income, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and appears under a separate heading.)

PROTECTION OF TRADE AND COMMERCE AGAINST UNREASONABLE RESTRAINTS BY LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to protect trade and commerce against unreasonable restraints by labor organizations. I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with an explanatory statement of its provisions by me, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the bill and statement will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 2912) to protect trade and commerce against unreasonable restraints by labor organizations, introduced by Mr. ROBERTSON, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That—

(a) Section 1 of the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," as amended (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 1), is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: "Provided further, That when a labor organization or the members thereof have unreasonably restrained trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, in articles, commodities, or services essential to the maintenance of the national economy, health, or safety, or any substantial segment thereof, such conduct shall not be made lawful, and the jurisdiction of any court of the United States to issue an injunction against any such conduct shall not be restricted or removed, by the act of October 15, 1914, entitled 'An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies and for other purposes,' as amended, or the act of March 23, 1932, entitled 'An act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes.'"

(b) Section 3 of the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," as amended (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 1), is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: "Provided, That when a labor organization or the members thereof have unreasonably restrained trade or commerce between any such Territory and another, or between any such Territory or Territories and any State or States or the District of Columbia, or with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States or foreign nations, in articles, commodities, or services essential to the maintenance of the national economy, health, or safety, or any substantial segment thereof, such conduct shall not be made lawful, and the jurisdiction of any court of the United States to issue an injunction against any such conduct shall not be restricted or removed, by the act of October 15, 1914, entitled 'An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies and for other purposes,' as amended, or the act of March 23, 1932, entitled 'An act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes.'"

The statement presented by Mr. ROBERTSON is as follows:

STATEMENT ON ANTITRUST LAW AMENDMENT

Labor leaders and labor unions today have the power, and will continue to have the power until Congress acts to amend existing laws, of unreasonably restraining trade to any extent their whims dictate, including control of production and prices, by unlawful means as well as lawful means. Unions are now secure and safe in the realization that the immunizing acts which Congress has passed, coupled with the interpretation the Supreme Court has given to those acts, make all labor and pseudo-labor activities safe from any corrective action by any court of the United States. Rightness or wrongness, wisdom or unwisdom, selfishness or unselfishness, and the gravity of the effect on the national welfare and security, have now become factors which labor unions can, if they desire, disregard. In this kind of a situation John L. Lewis can and has, by his 3-day-a-week work edict, tied up the coal resources of this Nation, for the very obvious purpose of controlling production so that coal supplies will be so curtailed, and the price of coal so held up, that his bargaining position, his arbitrary dominion over the coal industry, and his personal vanity, will be enhanced. This kind of blatant attempt to control production and prices, with only the most tenuous kind of relationship to the good of this Nation, or even the good of the coal miners, would have been unthinkable 20 years ago. It would have been the plainest kind of unreasonable restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and could have been prosecuted or enjoined as such. This intolerable situation cries for correction, and the simple amendment to the antitrust laws to which these remarks are addressed offers, in my judgment, the most understandable, effective, and reasonable method of dealing with this situation.

The text of the bill which I have offered is an amendment to section 1 of the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C., sec. 1), as follows:

"Section 1 of the act of July 2, 1890, entitled 'An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' as amended (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 1), is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: 'Provided further, That when a labor organization or the members thereof have unreasonably restrained trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, in articles, commodities, or services essential to the maintenance of the national economy, health, or safety, or any substantial segment thereof, such conduct shall not be made lawful, and the jurisdiction of any court of the United States to issue an injunction against any such conduct shall not be restricted or removed, by the act of October 15, 1914, entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," as amended, or the act of March 23, 1932, entitled "An act to amend the judicial code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes."'"

There is a second section identical in language to what I have just read, amending section 3 of the Sherman Act, which deals with trade and commerce involving the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States, as distinguished from commerce among the several States and with foreign nations. This second section of the amendment merely conforms section 3 to section 1.

The objective of the bill is not to change the Sherman Act itself in any way, but to restore to the Sherman Act the meaning which Congress always intended it to have, and which the Supreme Court had always said it had, until five members of that Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Frankfurter in the Hutcheson case (312 U. S. 219), declared in 1941 that the Norris-LaGuardia Act, an act purporting to deal, and intended by Congress to deal, solely with the availability of injunctive relief, was interpreted by the Court to have modified both the Sherman Act and the Clayton Act, so as to immunize all labor activities from the Sherman Act, a result which the Supreme Court had previously said, time after time, had never been intended by Congress.

In order to understand what the law now is on the applicability of the antitrust laws to labor-union activities, it is necessary to review briefly the history of the Sherman Act, and the amendments to it, as they have been applied to labor unions. The testimony before the subcommittee inquiring into this problem convinced me that when the Sherman Act was passed, in 1890, Congress had no intention of excluding or exempting labor-union activities from its prohibitions. Labor-union activities, like the activities of other organizations and individuals, were to be governed by the language of the act, and were to be outlawed if they involved restraints of trade. The Supreme Court declared in 1908 in the Danbury Hatters case (208 U. S. 774) that the Sherman Act did apply to labor unions engaging in restraints of trade, and that labor unions had no blanket immunity from the antitrust laws. A number of later cases reaffirmed this interpretation.

The Clayton Act of 1914 did two things affecting the relationship of labor-union activities to the Sherman Act. The first was a provision that the existence of labor organizations was declared lawful under the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C., sec. 17), a provision made necessary by the fear that the Government might start dissolution suits against labor unions, of the kind which had been successfully prosecuted to a conclusion in 1911 against the Standard Oil Co. and Tobacco Trust. The second pertinent provision of the Clayton Act prohibited the granting of injunctions by Federal courts against certain specific labor activities which even at that time were generally considered legal, such as peaceful picketing (15 U. S. C., sec. 52). Neither of these provisions of the Clayton Act undertook in any way to exempt or immunize labor unions from conduct unreasonably restraining trade, and the Clayton Act specifically confined the immunity to "lawfully carrying out" the "legitimate objects" of unions. The Supreme Court soon declared in the Duplex Printing Co. case (254 U. S. 443) that the Clayton Act had not been intended to give labor any blanket immunity from the antitrust laws. In the ensuing years other Supreme Court cases continued to uphold the doctrine that the Sherman Act was a bar against labor's engaging in unreasonable restraints of trade and commerce, the word "unreasonable"—the so-called "rule of reason"—having been read into the Sherman Act by the Supreme Court in 1911.

The next congressional enactment was the Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932. That act was an absolute prohibition against any Federal court issuing an injunction in practically any case arising out of a labor dispute. Nothing was said in the Norris-LaGuardia Act that would indicate that that act was an amendment of the Sherman Act or the Clayton Act in defining what was and was not a legal labor activity from the standpoint of substantive offenses. The Norris-LaGuardia Act was by its terms confined to the withdrawal of a particular remedy, the labor injunction. However, in 1941 Mr. Justice Frankfurter's opinion in the Hutcheson case held that activity which could not be enjoined because of the prohibition in the Norris-LaGuardia Act could never be a substantive offense under the Sherman Act. Under the Hutcheson case, not only is it no longer possible to enjoin any case arising out of a labor dispute; in effect, the Sherman Act as now construed by the Supreme Court is declared to mean that nothing can be a criminal offense, or the subject of a treble-damage suit, if it arises out of any kind of a labor dispute. This state of the law gives labor an unlimited license to do anything it chooses, by unlawful as well as lawful means, and still be safe from prosecution, injunction, or liability under the Sherman Act. This is a result which certainly was never intended by Congress, and it should be corrected by Congress without any further delay. The amendment I have proposed would overrule the Hutcheson case to the extent that when a labor union or its members have unreasonably restrained trade in commodities or services essential to the maintenance of the national economy, health, or safety they cannot use the cloak of the Norris-LaGuardia Act or the Clayton Act to escape a criminal prosecution or injunction which Congress in the Sherman Act itself declared were the appropriate and necessary methods for dealing with unlawful activity of this kind.

In the course of our subcommittee hearings, a number of other kinds of legislation were proposed for dealing with this situation. One proposed method was to outlaw union activity on a Nation-wide basis. An extreme measure of that kind cannot enlist my sympathy or support. Another method proposed was to define specifically and to spell out the particular kinds of labor-union activities which are legal, and those which are illegal. Such a task has seemed to me, after studying all the proposals that were made, an almost impossible objective. The difficulty is that once a list is made of the specific activities which are declared to be unlawful, the list must always be qualified by some sort of an exemption of activities of these kinds when they are clearly pursued with the primary purpose of furthering a legitimate union objective. Once such a qualification is introduced, the whole matter of intention and purpose, i. e., whether the primary purpose is in furtherance of legitimate union objectives like bettering working conditions, or whether the primary purpose is to control production or prices, becomes controlling. Thus the final decision of whether the conduct is lawful or unlawful again comes back to a finding by the court to which the matter is submitted, and I believe that the better approach is to let the original, general language of the Sherman Act itself stand, making no attempt to spell out particular kinds of conduct which are lawful or unlawful, but merely prohibiting unreasonable restraints of trade and monopolies.

Some suggestions have been made of modifying the Sherman Act by outlawing labor monopolies, rather than by attacking unreasonable restraints of trade by labor. In other words, such a proposal would amend section 2 of the Sherman Act, dealing with monopolies, rather than section 1, which deals with restraints of trade. However, although either business or labor can engage in restraints of trade which to any fair-minded court would seem to be unreasonable obstructions to the free flow of commerce, and the free play of competition, the monopoly provisions of the Sherman Act cannot be said to have the same sort of application to labor unions as they have to business combinations. Every labor union is seeking to monopolize the supply of labor, either on a comparatively limited scale or on a national scale. That kind of monopolization is the avowed objective of labor unions, and it has been approved as a matter of public policy by Congress, not only in the Wagner Act, but also in the Taft-Hartley law. I have no intention or desire of asking that Congress outlaw that type of labor monopolization, strongly as I do feel that restraints of trade by labor can be as vicious and far reaching as any restraint of trade ever attempted by a business combination.

The original purpose of the Sherman Act was to prevent restraints of trade and monopolization intended to restrict production, fix prices, or otherwise control the market to the detriment of the consuming public. The public can be hurt just as badly when these restraints are imposed by labor unions, as it can when these restraints are imposed by business combinations, and in fact no business combination of which I have ever heard has achieved the kind of arbitrary power and control that John L. Lewis now possesses and wields. My bill will not abolish, or even threaten, the existence of Nation-wide unions, or their right to strike. It will not destroy industry-wide bargaining, as will be obvious to anyone who reads cases like United Mine Workers v. Coronado Coal Co. (259 U. S. 344 (1922); 268 U. S. 295 (1925)). Nor will my bill undertake to police interstate commerce, or to regulate the internal affairs of unions. Under the doctrine of the Apex Hosiery Co. case (310 U. S. 469), decided less than a year before the Hutcheson case, the Supreme Court declared that the regulation of union affairs is not governed by the Sherman Act, but is to be controlled by the acts dealing with labor such as the Wagner Act.

My bill would overrule the Hutcheson case. It would not overrule the Apex case or any of the other cases through which, over a period of 50 years, the Supreme Court of the United States had forged the Sherman Act, pursuant to the will of Congress, into a vital and potent force in keeping our economy a free one—free not only from the unreasonable restraints imposed by business combinations, but also free from the unreasonable restraints which labor had imposed and might seek to impose. The Apex case shows that buried beneath the artificial veneer with which Mr. Justice Frankfurter in the Hutcheson case had coated the Clayton and Norris-LaGuardia Acts, the Sherman Act still condemns restraints of trade, by labor as well as by business, in the same forceful language this Congress enacted in 1890. Labor unions today are immune only because of what I believe was a completely erroneous interpretation by the Supreme Court, in the Hutcheson case, of these two subsequent acts of Congress. The control of production and the fixing of prices by union action, in commodities or services essential to the public welfare of the United States, seems to me just as objectionable from the standpoint of the ultimate effect on our economy as similar action by employer groups. The bill which I have offered would in plain and simple language remove the immunizing effect of the Clayton and Norris-LaGuardia Acts from conduct which up until 1941 had been almost universally branded as illegal and against the public interest, and which had always been regarded as outlawed by the Sherman Act. It would leave the Government free to go into a court and it would leave the court free to put a stop to labor-union practices which are so detrimental to the national welfare that some remedy, beyond the temporary stopgap remedy of the Taft-Hartley Act, is essential to protect the people of this country. The Sherman Act would then again serve, as it originally served, as a brake on unions which seek to put their own activities ahead of the national welfare.

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN FUNDS IN COOPERATION WITH NEW JERSEY STATE HIGHWAY DEPARTMENT

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague, the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize the transfer of funds allocated for expenditure in cooperation with the New Jersey State Highway Department on State Highway Route No. 100 to State Parkway Route No. 4, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2914) to authorize the transfer of funds allocated for expenditure in cooperation with the New Jersey State Highway Department on State Highway Route No. 100 to State Parkway Route No. 4, introduced by Mr. HENDRICKSON (for himself and Mr. SMITH of New Jersey), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Works, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the New Jersey State Highway Department, pursuant to act of the legislature of said State approved April 3, 1945 (ch. 83, Laws of New Jersey, 1945), which makes provision for the establishment, construction, and maintenance of freeways and parkways, has embarked upon the construction of its first freeway project located upon State Route No. 100, a new route which is partially graded but on which no road now exists; and

Whereas certain amounts of State and Federal-aid road funds have been allocated and partially expended for the acquisition of portions of the right-of-way required for and for initial construction on said project; and

Whereas by act approved October 27, 1948 (ch. 454, Laws of New Jersey, 1948), the legislature of said State established the New Jersey Turnpike Authority and empowered said authority to construct, maintain, repair, and operate turnpike projects to facilitate vehicular traffic and remove the handicaps and hazards due to the congestion of such traffic on the highways of the State, such projects to be financed by the issue of turnpike revenue bonds payable solely from tolls and revenues derived therefrom and to become free roads on the State highway system upon amortization of such bonds; and

Whereas engineering studies have disclosed that from the standpoint of urgent need, topography, industrial activity, and economy of construction, the most suitable location for a turnpike project that reasonably may be expected to amortize the cost of its construction by tolls and revenues derived therefrom is that selected for State Route No. 100, in view of which the New Jersey Turnpike Authority has decided to adopt said route for such a project and to proceed with the construction thereof pursuant to the act creating said authority; and

Whereas the New Jersey State Highway Department, pursuant to said act of April 3, 1945, has also begun construction, with the aid of Federal funds, of a parkway, designated as route 4 parkway, which will run practically the full length of the State and which the State desires to complete as a Federal-aid project:

Be it enacted, etc., That all Federal-aid road funds heretofore programed for expenditure in cooperation with the New Jersey State Highway Department on State Route No. 100 are hereby authorized to be transferred for programing and expenditure in cooperation with the New Jersey State Highway Department in expediting the construction of route 4 parkway of said State.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL SECURITY ACT RELATING TO PROCUREMENT AUTHORITY OF DEFENSE DEPARTMENT

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend the National Security Act of 1947 and related acts involving procurement authority of the Defense Department, and I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement I have prepared in connection with the introduction of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and without objection, the statement presented by the Senator from Washington will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2916) to amend the National Security Act of 1947 to provide for the review of procurement plans and policies of the Military Establishment which involve the relocation of industrial plants and personnel, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

The statement presented by Mr. MAGNUSON is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MAGNUSON

Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill proposing certain amendments to the National Security Act of 1947 and related acts involving procurement authority of the Defense Department. The language of the amendments I am proposing should not be considered a finished draft. Study by the appropriate committee of the problem which has stimulated this bill will undoubtedly bring to light the need for changes.

The objectives I am seeking in this bill represent a matter of deep concern, not only to me but to other Senators from the Pacific Northwest, the Great Lakes, and coastal States as well as the people residing therein. Many Senators will recall the agitation in the areas I have mentioned which accompanied the press announcement last fall that production of the Air Force B-47 was being allocated to Wichita, Kans., rather than the Boeing plant in Seattle. One of the reasons given was the relative vulnerability of the Northwest to enemy attack.

Despite subsequent reassurances from the Department of Defense on this score, there still remains in the minds of many of us the conviction that the power to allocate procurement contracts carries with it the power to relocate production and even industry itself.

Under certain circumstances it may be necessary, for security reasons, to disperse or even relocate aircraft or other defense production. Decisions of this magnitude and importance, however, should be made by appropriate civilian authorities or, to put it another way, there should be adequate civilian participation in any military decisions which would tend to disrupt the economy of any great section of this country.

Should the appropriate committee decide that amendments to the national security and related acts are desirable, patterned after the bill I am introducing today, certain types of military decisions would thereafter be reviewed by civilian authority before, rather than after, action is instituted.

Specifically, the bill would require the Munitions Board and the National Security Resources Board to review plans and policies for the procurement of supplies and services by or for the Department of Defense, when such procurement may result in:

"(A) The relocation of private or Government-owned industrial plants or facilities, or of personnel employed in such plants; or

"(B) The transfer of productive activity from private or Government-owned industrial plants or facilities situated in one geographical region of the United States to plants or facilities situated in another such region, or from privately owned industrial plants or facilities to industrial plants or facilities owned or operated by the Federal Government."

I have no desire whatever to interfere with the orderly procurement plans and policies of the Defense Department. I merely seek to insure that when such plans and policies threaten to disrupt and dislocate the economy of a region there be some reasonable review by civilians. The people of this country are willing to do anything that needs to be done to insure our security. Before making sacrifices, however, they want to be sure those sacrifices are necessary. Adequate civilian participation will provide that assurance.

ARNOLD ENGINEERING DEVELOPMENT CENTER

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a joint resolution to name the Air Force's Air Engineering Development Center for the late Gen. H. H. "Hap" Arnold.

It is fitting, I believe, that the world's greatest aeronautical research and development center should be named for the American airman who did more than any other to guide air power to maturity. General Arnold's active career spanned the whole era of modern military aviation in this country, from the Wright brothers to the triumph of supersonic flight. Throughout that career General Arnold was a visionary who breathed life into dreams which other men discarded or ignored.

"Hap" Arnold's great faith and astounding ability served as an inspiration to the men who sought to master the air frontier. His initiative was an ever-present challenge to the scientists and technicians, as well as the strategists. His influence made our Air Force what it is today. By continuing his influence over the research engineers and scientists, perhaps we can help make our Air Force what it must be for tomorrow.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 148) to provide for the designation of the Air Engineering Development Center as the Arnold Engineering Development Center, introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

LIMITATION WITH RESPECT TO TAX ON INCOME—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States imposing a limitation with respect to taxation of income. The joint resolution reads as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. Except during the period of hostilities in any war during which the United States is a belligerent, the Congress shall not lay or collect any tax on taxable income at an effective rate in excess of 50 percent of such income.

"SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within 7 years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress."

I ask unanimous consent that a tabulation of data secured from the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, showing the top-bracket rate for normal and surtaxes, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the tabulation presented by the Senator from California will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 149) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States imposing a limitation with respect to taxation of income, introduced by Mr. KNOWLAND, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The tabulation presented by Mr. KNOWLAND is as follows:

CONTINUATION OF INVESTIGATION OF BANKING AND CREDIT LEGISLATION, ETC.

Mr. MAYBANK submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 218), which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Resolved, That the authority of the Committee on Banking and Currency, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, under Senate Resolution 101, Eighty-first Congress, agreed to May 6, 1949 (providing for an investigation of problems relating to banking and credit legislation, small business and economic stabilization), is hereby continued until February 15, 1951.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF REPORT ENTITLED "PROGRESS ON THE HOOVER COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS"

Mr. McCLELLAN submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 70), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of Senate Report No. 1158, Eighty-first Congress, first session, entitled "Progress on the Hoover Commission Recommendations," of which 3,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, 1,000 copies for the Senate document room, and 500 copies for the House document room.

AMENDMENT OF DISPLACED PERSONS ACT OF 1948—AMENDMENT

Mr. TYDINGS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4567) to amend the Displaced Persons Act of 1948, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE—AMENDMENT

Mr. PEPPER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3905) to amend section 3121 of the Internal Revenue Code to give the Commissioner subpena power in cases involving refusal to renew licenses for making industrial alcohol, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR MARTIN AT NORTHAMPTON COUNTY REPUBLICAN CAMPAIGN DINNER

[Mr. MARTIN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by him at the Northampton County Republican campaign dinner, at Easton, Pa., Friday, November 4, 1949, which appears in the RECORD.]

ADDRESS BY SENATOR MARTIN AT FIFTY-FIRST ANNUAL DINNER OF THE PENNSYLVANIA SOCIETY

[Mr. MARTIN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by him before the fifty-first annual dinner of the Pennsylvania Society, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York, N. Y., on December 10, 1949, which appears in the Appendix.]

CHASE NATIONAL BANK FUND TO AID SMALL BUSINESS

[Mr. MAYBANK asked and obtained leave to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Loan Fund Set Up by Chase National," published in the New York Times of January 20, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

LOUIS HOUCK—ADDRESS BY NORWIN D. HOUSER

[Mr. KEM asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address entitled "Louis Houck," delivered by Hon. Norwin D. Houser, of Perryville, Mo., judge of the Twenty-seventh Judicial Circuit of Missouri, at the Southeast Missouri State College, Cape Girardeau, Mo., on October 15, 1949, which appears in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 3 minutes in which to read a brief statement on Federal rent control.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I have been concerned about statements which have been made and reports which have reached me—most of which have been rumors and statements of opinion rather than reports—that there will be major opposition in Congress and even on the Democratic side to the extension of Federal rent control for an additional year.

Mr. President, I campaigned last fall on a platform which included a pledge to support the extension of Federal rent controls. I do not think that the results of that election were unnoticed in the rest of the country. To my mind it is inconceivable that the Congress will fail to follow the leadership of the President and his recommendations for the extension of Federal rent control for an additional year, and its strengthening if that is found necessary. No single factor in the national economy is so explosive and so urgently calls for continued control and regulation.

In recognition of these reports and these rumors, I issued a statement to the press yesterday asserting my own opinion that rent control should be extended and that the junior Senator from New York was determined, insofar as it lay within his power, to fight for such extension.

Mr. President, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to insert that statement in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, the statement issued by me.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The question has been raised in New York State, as elsewhere across the Nation, as to whether the Federal Government will or should extend rent control for an additional year. I sense a growing apprehension among persons of average and low income who are renters and a growing sense of expectation among landlord groups that there will be no Federal Rent Control after June 30 of this year.

I cannot believe that Congress will permit this to happen. I shall do everything in my own power to prevent it. To allow this to happen would be to set off a bomb in our entire price and wage structure. Whatever the failings of the present rent control situation and whatever the hardships on particular individuals, the no-rent-control cure would be far worse, and might be disastrous.

I noted with much interest the recent analysis by the Office of the Housing Expediter of rental trends in areas which have been decontrolled by local offices.

It shows that in six widely separated cities more than 30 to 67 percent of all of the units which have been decontrolled showed rent increases. In every one of these cities the greatest rent increases have been imposed on persons who pay less than $30 a month for rent. I regret to note that the longer the decontrol has been in effect in a city, the more rents have risen.

For instance, the case in which 67 percent of the units had rent increases occurred in Dallas, Tex., the first city to abandon controls. In Houston, Tex., the last of the six cities to remove controls, the percentage of units showing increases was the smallest—31 percent.

These figures indicate to me that even under the existing law, unjustified rent increases are taking place wherever controls have been removed and that the heaviest burden is falling on those who are least able to pay.

I have not seen any data that proves to my satisfaction that competitive conditions in the housing field are improving fast enough to warrant the repeal of the Federal rent law. On the contrary, conditions in my own State show that Federal controls are not only desirable but that they are absolutely essential. Not a single city, town, or village in New York State has exercised its option under the Federal law to end rent control. I understand that this is also true in about half of the other 48 States.

Many opponents of Federal rent control contend that the basic property rights of American citizens are involved here. But it is my contention that the real issue is whether some property owners have the right to charge exorbitant rents and reap unreasonable profits at the expense of their fellow citizens. I do not see any way to prevent this form of exploitation except through the continued imposition of Federal controls—at least until such a time as when there are enough dwelling units available to maintain competition and keep rents at a reasonable level.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I also ask the unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as part of these remarks, a broadcast by Housing Expediter Tighe E. Woods over the CBS network on January 16. Mr. Woods expresses in this broadcast his own attitude—which I presume is also the attitude of the national administration—on the extension of rent control. Mr. Woods cites some very compelling figures and circumstances which I think should be available to the Members of the Senate and the country generally.

There being no objection, a transcript of the broadcast by Mr. Woods was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At 526 E. Seventh South Street in Salt Lake City, Utah, Nicholas Franks lives with his wife and 6-year-old daughter. Nicholas Franks is a machinist for the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad. In the last few months his take-home pay has dropped about 40 percent. Any decrease in family income is serious enough these days. But it's even more serious for the Franks family, because their rent has been increased. They used to pay $32.50 a month. Now they pay $45.00 a month. And the rent comes due every month.

Salt Lake City is only one of many cities where increases in rent have occurred. These are the cities where rent control has been wiped out, where rent control no longer protects tenants from unreasonable increases in rent.

But what's brought about this situation? How was rent control lifted in these cities?

Under the present rent-control law, Congress provided three ways by which controls can be ended: By States and municipalities, by local rent-advisory boards, and by the Housing Expediter. When a State or local government ends rent control, it cannot be restored, no matter how high rents may go. When controls are lifted on the recommendation of a local rent board, or when the Expediter ends them, they can be put back into effect if rents go up too high.

Since the present law went into effect, last April, four States have taken action to end controls—Nebraska, Texas, Wisconsin, and Alabama. In the same period, local governments have wiped out rent control in 200 towns and cities. Local rent-advisory boards, which are made up of groups of representative citizens in each town where rent control is in effect, have eliminated controls in only five communities. As Housing Expediter, I have lifted control in 467 communities.

I have been criticized for lifting controls in such a large number of towns and cities. But I am under a mandate from the Congress to decontrol wherever possible. However, the Housing Expediter has the authority to put controls back into effect if rents rise unreasonably, but the action of the State or local Government cannot be recalled. In only three of the communities which I have decontrolled has it been necessary to restore controls. In one city, Spokane, Wash., which we decontrolled, about half of the dwellings covered in a recent survey had increases in rent. The increases averaged 18½ percent. We are now making a further study of housing in this city to determine whether controls should be put back into effect.

During the past few months, statements have been made to the effect that rents have not increased very much in communities where State and local governments have ended rent control. Until now we have not had accurate information on these towns and cities. But tonight I can give you the real facts.

Recently, the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics—which is an independent, fact-finding agency—made surveys of rents in six of the largest cities now without rent control as a result of State or local action.

They found widespread rent increases.

In Dallas, Tex., and Knoxville, Tenn., two out of every three of the families in the survey have had their rents boosted.

In Jacksonville, Fla., and Salt Lake City, rent increases hit about half of the families.

Forty percent have had their rents raised in Topeka, Kans.; 31 percent in Houston, Tex.

And in every one of those cities more rents are being raised, month after month.

These increases are not small. They are substantial increases.

In Dallas, these families are paying 35 percent more rent each month.

In Houston, 41 percent; 30 in Topeka; Knoxville, 27; Salt Lake City, 16; and 26 in Jacksonville.

But that is only a part of the story.

The people who are hit the hardest are those who are least able to pay higher rents.

Take Dallas for example.

In Dallas almost three out of every four families included in this survey who earn less than $40 a week have had their rent increased approximately 50 percent.

The rent comes due every month. If you don't pay, you get tossed out. But you can't run the risk of being out in the street, because you can't find another place to rent, at least not at the price a family making $40 a week can afford.

The same thing is true in Topeka, Kans., where Mrs. Erlene Kistler lives. Mrs. Kistler is a widow. She has a 6-year-old daughter whose name is Rita. They live at 417½ West Seventh Street in Topeka. Mrs. Kistler has had a lot of trouble trying to find a place to live where they don't object to children. The apartment where she lives at present used to rent for $45 a month. Now the rent is $60, an increase of almost 35 percent. This winter Rita needed a new coat to wear. But the family budget is too small. Mrs. Kistler has had to make over an old coat of her own.

I told you that in Salt Lake City, where the Franks family lives, half of the families surveyed have had their rent increased. At the time the survey was made, the increases in rent in Salt Lake City averaged 16 percent. Of course, that 16 percent on top of the increases they had already received under rent control. But there's another angle to the story of Salt Lake City that's important.

The Salt Lake Tribune of December 23 printed a news item in which Mr. Darrell Welling, executive vice president of the Salt Lake Real Estate Board, denied reports that landlords were contemplating a new rent increase on January 1. The news story said: "Landlords on January 1 will have a free market on their properties to work out problems with their tenants. Pledges signed by landlords not to increase rents more than 10 percent will expire at that time." That's the end of the quotation. Mr. Welling added that he thinks some landlords in Salt Lake City may decrease rents. We hope he is right.

I make this point about the rumors of more increases in Salt Lake City because similar conditions apparently apply to other cities where rent control has been ended by State or local governments. On the basis of the BLS survey, it appears that the longer a city has been without rent control, the greater the number of families who receive rent increases. Houston, Tex., had been decontrolled 1 month when the survey was made. Thirty-one percent of the tenants were paying increased rents. Dallas had been decontrolled 5 months when the survey was made. Sixty-seven percent of the families were paying higher rents. This clearly contradicts the contention of opponents of rent control that when a city ends rent control prematurely rents will go up only a little at first and then level off at reasonable rates.

The BLS surveys were made in only a few of the larger cities where controls have been lifted by local and State governments. But hundreds of families in other cities now without controls have reported similar increases.

In Omaha, Nebr., rent control was lifted by action of the State legislature. "Moon" Mullen who lives at 201 South Thirty-sixth Street in Omaha, is only one of many people there who are now paying increases in rents. "Moon" has three children. One girl is in high school. Their rent used to be $42.50 a month. Now it's $80. The children have been needing new shoes for some time. But "Moon" can't afford to buy new shoes now that his rent has been increased about 100 percent.

Day after day, dozens of letters come to me in Washington, asking if there is anything I can do to help families whose rent has been raised. Here is just one example of the kind of letter I receive. It's dated December 20, and it's from a housewife in Oklahoma City. She says, "Dear Mr. Woods: Please put rent control on again in Oklahoma City. Our landlord has raised the rent from $45 to $65 a month, and we can't pay it. We have one boy 11 years old and no one will take a child. We looked at a place Sunday which rented under rent control for $20 a month. Now it is $65. I don't know what we and dozens and dozens of families are going to do."

This housewife went on to say that she would have to move from her home on January 9. That was a week ago. I hope she was able to find a new place to live.

I wish I could have done something to help her. But I couldn't. Oklahoma City was decontrolled by action of the local city council.

There is another factor which now faces families in cities where rent control has been lifted prematurely. It is fear of eviction.

A moment ago, I said to you that hundreds of families have reported increases in rent. But for every family who reports an increase, there are thousands more who are afraid to do so for fear of being evicted. Time after time, as we talked to people in the cities I have told you about, we were met with this statement: "I can't let you use my name because I might be evicted if my landlord found out that I reported the increase."

Some people argue that rent control should be abolished right away. Landlords have been particularly vocal about it. And I am the first to admit that they have their side of the story. In a short time I expect to issue a statement on our present liberal policy for granting increases in rent to landlords.

No one wants controls any longer than is absolutely necessary. But we still have rent control because the need for housing is so critical in many cities and towns that the premature lifting of controls forces tenants to pay exorbitant increases in rent.

I have already told you what's happened to rents in some cities. Let me repeat the amounts of those increases.

In Dallas, rent increases average 35 percent.

In Houston, 41 percent; 30 percent in Topeka; Knoxville, 27; Salt Lake City, 16; and 26 in Jacksonville.

If you want to know what it would mean to you to pay an increase in rent like families in these cities and others are paying, just take a piece of paper and pencil and figure out how much of a dent it would make in your own budget to pay an increase of 35 percent. And then what are you going to cut out to make up this increase?

Last year, committees in the Senate and the House of Representatives held hearings on rent control and reported to the Congress that controls should be continued. Both of these reports made statements concerning the effect of lifting rent control which are very significant.

The Senate report says: "If rent controls are relaxed, or lifted entirely so that rents continue to go up—we are likely to find that the farm groups, industry, retail trade—the whole economy would suffer a severe blow. Any increase in rents today would be at the expense of diets, medical care, clothing, and other necessities of life of millions of American citizens."

This report to the Senate has proven to be "the handwriting on the wall." The prophecy has come true. You have heard what happens when rent control is lifted too soon. The families who are paying increased rents cannot afford clothing they need, and other necessities of life, such as food and medical care. This cut in their purchasing power has already had its effect upon retail trade and will continue to do so, because the increased rents come due every month.

As I said, we still have rent control because the shortage of housing in many cities is still so critical that the lifting of controls forces tenants to pay increases in rent that result in actual hardship. The removal of rent control is not the solution to our continuing housing shortage. That is like taking away a sick man's medicine to see whether he will get worse. The way to end the housing shortage—and get rid of rent control—is to build more homes. And when it is possible for the average family—with an income of around $50 a week—to get a place to rent at a price they can afford, then, and not until then, can we abolish rent control.

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL FOREST ADVISORY BOARD OF APPEALS

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement from the Department of Agriculture, together with an executive order by the Secretary of Agriculture establishing a National Forest Advisory Board of Appeals.

I may say, Mr. President, in explanation of the request, that last November, in the city of Graybull, Wyo., I attended a meeting of permittees upon the national forests at which was discussed the broad problem of the settlement of disputes between permittees and the Forest Service. More than 200 stockmen were present expressing their interest and concern in the administration of the national forests, particularly with respect to the solution of controversies arising from decisions of the Forest Service on matters affecting grazing.

It seemed to me to be desirable that an appellate procedure should be established for the settlement of such disputes. Thereupon, on returning to Washington I consulted Chief Forester Watts and his aides, discussed the matter at some length with them and suggested that an impartial appeals board should be established. Secretary Brannan wrote me last week saying that after consulting the law officers of the Department he was advised, and I think the advice was correct, that the Secretary had the authority under present law to establish such a board of appeals. The Secretary, in issuing the order, has provided, by establishment of this board of appeals, for an impartial hearing, upon any disputed cases which permittees may appeal, by an impartial board upon which the Forest Service itself is not represented, but before which it may appear. It is to consist of five employees of the Department whose duty will be to hear cases on their merits.

Any permittee who is dissatisfied with a decision of the Chief of Forest Service may make written appeal to the Secretary and will then be entitled as a matter of right to a hearing. I am grateful to Secretary Brannan and to Chief Forester Watts for their spirit of cooperation.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I am not going to object to the unanimous-consent request for the insertion in the RECORD, of course, but I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Wyoming if I heard him correctly—and I could not hear everything he said—that authorization has been made by law prior to this time for the establishment of such an appeals board.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Secretary has been advised, and I think the advice is correct, that under the existing law the Secretary does have the authority to establish such an appeals board within the Department. I think that is a very substantial gain in the interest of the users of the national forests.

Mr. WHERRY. What about the appropriations to carry on the work of the board? Will that require any substantial amount of money?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The board will consist of five members, of the staff of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WHERRY. From the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Exactly; and their compensation is already provided for.

Mr. WHERRY. Yes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. For that reason probably no extra appropriations will be required.

Mr. WHERRY. Probably not.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECRETARY BRANNAN TO SET UP NATIONAL FOREST ADVISORY BOARD OF APPEALS

Secretary of Agriculture Charles F. Brannan today established a National Forest Advisory Board of Appeals in the Department of Agriculture.

The Board, established by an order of the Secretary, is to advise the Secretary on any appeals to him from decisions of the Chief of the Forest Service involving any public use of the national forests and other lands under administration or control of the Forest Service. The Board will consist of five employees of the Department of Agriculture selected from agencies within the Department other than the Forest Service. Membership of the new Board will be announced later.

"Upon receipt of a written request of the Secretary from the appellant," the order stated, "the Secretary shall refer the appeal to the Board before which the appellant may appear if he so desires and the Board shall consider the appeal on its merits and furnish its advice and recommendations to the Secretary."

Under existing regulations, users of national forest lands, such as grazing permittees, purchasers of timber, and holders of other permits, may appeal from administrative decisions of the Forest Service to the Secretary of Agriculture. When an appeal comes to him, Secretary Brannan said, it has always been the practice to call upon members of the Secretary's staff to make an objective study of the case prior to his personal consideration and decision. A number of grazing permittees, however, have expressed a desire for a more formal arrangement.

The new National Forest Advisory Board of Appeals should not be confused with the National Forest Board of Review established in 1948. The Board of Review is composed of private citizens. Its purpose is to advise the Secretary on questions of general policy and the solution of major problems arising in connection with administration of the national forests.

NATIONAL FOREST ADVISORY BOARD OF APPEALS

There is hereby established the National Forest Advisory Board of Appeals to advise the Secretary on any appeals to him from the decisions of the Chief of the Forest Service involving any public use of the national forests and other lands under the administration or control of the Forest Service. The Board shall be comprised of five employees of the Department of Agriculture, to be selected from any agencies within the Department except the Forest Service. A majority of the members of the Board shall constitute a quorum. Upon receipt of a written request to the Secretary from the appellant, the Secretary shall refer the appeal to the Board before which the appellant may appear if he so desires and the Board shall consider the appeal on its merits and furnish its advice and recommendations to the Secretary.

CHARLES F. BRANNAN,
Secretary.

ATTITUDE OF BRITISH TOWARD GERMAN PLAN TO END RATIONING OF FOOD AND GAS

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point an article from the Washington Evening Star of last Saturday entitled "British Irked at News Germans Plan To End Rationing of Food and Gas."

Mr. President, to my mind, this article demonstrates rather dramatically the complete failure the Socialist experiment in Great Britain has been. It appears from the article that Germany, our defeated enemy, is already better off in many respects and is making faster progress than Britain, one of the victorious allies. It seems that socialism in Britain has been even more disastrous to the welfare of the British people than the destruction of the war. Today, almost 5 years after the end of the war, Great Britain is still suffering from a severe shortage of many of the necessities of life. Germany, on the other hand, which has embraced the free-enterprise system, has been able to end the rationing of practically everything except sugar.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITISH IRKED AT NEWS GERMANS PLAN TO END RATIONING OF FOOD AND GAS

LONDON, January 21.—The British are unhappy and irritated at news that their exenemy, Germany, is going to take gasoline and all foodstuffs except sugar off ration.

It makes them wonder who won the war, anyway.

There is no prospect of rationing ending in Britain for years. The Socialists defend it on the grounds that it provides fair share for all. And they say that the average nutrition level here is higher than it was before the war.

They admit that food shops in western Germany are stacked high with commodities the British people have been unable to buy for many years. But, they insist, the German cupboard still conceals some terrifying skeletons alongside the juicy steaks.

RECKLESS SPENDING CHARGED

For example, a correspondent in Germany for the British labor paper, the London Daily Herald, writes: "The German Government has ended rationing at the cost of an almost reckless spending of dollar reserves. German exports sank from $93,000,000 in September to $81,000,000 in October. Imports, of which food is the big item, rose by $30,000,000 to an October total of $191,000,000."

The Herald correspondent insists that the purchasing power of the masses is so limited in western Germany that it was easy to end rationing. He says the average German housewife has little left over from her husband's pay packet for butter at 40 cents a pound and geese from $5.60 to $8.40 each. Ruhr miners who are the wealthiest group of workers earn only $14 to $16 a week, according to his reports. He says the basic diet of the German workers is now, as it has been since the latter days of the war, brown bread and potatoes and gravy with occasional sausages but little other meat.

"At the other end of the scale, Germany's employers and the underworld that flourishes in the jungle of currency rackets, night clubs and swagger hotels, live in grand style."

GERMANS DENY REPORTS

German officials themselves, however, insist that butter, meat, fat, eggs, bread, and milk are all available in ample supplies to allow their being sold at prices all can afford.

What it boils down to is that the West German Government under American tutelage and with American dollar support has embraced the free-enterprise system of America. The British Government, which also enjoys dollar aid, has gone in for Socialist-controlled economy. It will be an interesting thing to see which of these two biggest industrial countries in western Europe recovers first.

British car owners are a minority group compared to the millions in America. There are only about 2,000,000 cars here. But Britons don't begin to get the use out of their cars that Americans do—or that 300,000 car owners in western Germany will be able to do after February 1. Here in Britain, the basic gas ration allows for only 90 miles of driving a month.

ASK FOR MORE GASOLINE

Spokesmen for the automobile clubs here, think it is fantastic that gas should be ration-free in Germany and rationed here. In fact they point out that gas is ration-free also in France, Belgium, Holland, Italy, Norway, Portugal, Sweden, and Switzerland.

These spokesmen say: "It would be difficult to sustain the argument that our economic plight is so much worse than that of the rest of western Europe, including exenemy countries. We are convinced that the standard ration could be considerably increased without any adverse effect on the sterling-dollar balance."

Some critics feel that the British Government is keeping gas tightly rationed so that those people who own cars aren't much better off than those who have to ride busses—and thus there are fair shares for all. What "fair shares" means in many instances, say these critics, is a leveling down.

The only break a British motorist gets is in price. He pays about 31 cents a gallon. This may seem high in America, but the Germans have been paying 63 cents a gallon for their rationed gas and 84 cents on the black market.

THE COAL SITUATION IN DELAWARE

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement prepared by me on the coal situation in Delaware, and also a letter dated January 20 from Mr. Leon Walker, president, Delaware State Coal Club, Wilmington, Del., which confirms the facts set forth in my statement.

There being no objection, the statement by Mr. WILLIAMS and the letter from Mr. Walker were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, following up the situation which has been described by Senators from various States with respect to the coal crisis, I wish to make a few observations on the coal supply in my own State of Delaware. While at home over the week end, I made it a point to obtain first-hand information on the coal shortage. As a result of the investigation which I have personally made, I find that in my own county of Sussex, where there exists a $100,000,000 broiler industry, stocks of coal on hand for broiler growers have been reduced to about 1 week's requirements. This is a dangerous, low level.

If we should have a prolonged cold snap, the coal situation as it affects the broiler industry, as well as other industries, institutions, and homes, will be alarming. In addition to my own personal investigation, I have received reports that coal dealers throughout the State of Delaware show stocks extremely low and unless relief is provided much suffering and economic loss will be inevitable.

As has been pointed out by the distinguished Senators from Ohio (Senators TAFT and BRICKER) and by many other Senators from various parts of our Nation, the sole responsibility for the continuance of this deplorable situation rests with the President of the United States. It has been and it should be continued to be made clear to the American people that the Congress of the United States in the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (the Taft-Hartley law) has given the Chief Executive, President Truman, full authority under which such a crisis as now exists in the coal industry may be speedily ended.

The continued denunciation of the Taft-Hartley labor law by the President of the United States has lent encouragement to the left-wing labor elements in this country to continue to ignore the public interest. This law was passed by the Congress over the veto of the President by an overwhelming vote of both parties, and it is time that the President of the United States, as Chief Executive, recognize that it is his constitutional duty to enforce this law.

DELAWARE STATE COAL CLUB,
Wilmington, Del., January 20, 1950.

Hon. JOHN J. WILLIAMS,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILLIAMS: Confirming my telegram of date, copy enclosed, reports received from representative retail coal dealers throughout the State show their present stock of prepared sizes of anthracite for domestic heating purposes is extremely low and should we have normal winter weather a critical emergency will exist within a period of 3 or 4 days, or at least a week.

Many dealers are now out of sizes and due to the 3-day operation at the mines, shipments are necessarily confined to those days and if not then made no shipments can be made until the following week, plus a further delay of a week to 10 days for rail movement before any coal can be received. The present 3-day production schedule cannot possibly meet normal winter weather demands and with stocks exhausted and limited shipments, an acute emergency will quickly develop.

Reports from the lower end of the State also indicate that the stocks of nut coal on hand by dealers supplying broiler growers will not exceed 1 week's normal winter requirements. The only solution is for immediate resumption of anthracite production on a normal weekly basis. Should we have a spell of cold weather, further delay in handling the present situation will be disastrous. The President should act before it is too late.

I have taken the liberty of addressing you on the subject because of its importance.

With kindest regards,

Very truly yours,

LEON WALKER,
President.

SERIOUS SITUATION OF COKING-COAL MINERS AND FAMILIES

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, in the county in Pennsylvania which produces the coking coal which is used in the production of steel and certain other metals there is a very serious situation as it relates to the wives and children of the soft-coal miners.

I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a telegram from Mr. Joe L. Dickson, editor of the Morning Herald, of Uniontown, Pa.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNIONTOWN, PA., January 22, 1950.

Wives and children of soft-coal miners in district 4 (Fayette and Greene Counties) are suffering hunger and near starvation as the result of circumstances over which they have no control. Their credit at industry-affiliated stores has been discontinued. State relief agency procrastinating and inadequate. Conditions are critical. No one wants that.

The Morning Herald appeals to you as their representative in the Senate of the United States in their behalf. This newspaper suggests that you appeal to John L. Lewis, United Mine Workers of America president, to establish some form of relief and that you renew your efforts to push through a resolution already introduced that President Truman declare a national emergency and enforce provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

THE MORNING HERALD,
Uniontown, Pa.,
JOE L. DICKSON, Editor.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks my reply to the telegram to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the reply was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. JOE L. DICKSON,
Editor, the Morning Herald,
Uniontown, Pa.

I have given a great deal of thought and effort to the appalling situation described in your telegram of January 22.

It is inhuman and un-American that women and children should be deprived of food.

It is outrageous that they should be forced to suffer hunger and misery because they are innocent victims of dictatorial powers over their lives.

In previous strikes, before the establishment of the United Mine Workers welfare fund, some measure of relief was afforded the families of strikers through the United Mine Workers and its local unions.

Such relief, inadequate as it was, is not being given today, even though the unions are in better financial condition than ever before.

It has not been long since John L. Lewis backed up the striking steelworkers with United Mine Workers funds. Yet, money to provide the necessities of life for coal miners and their families has not been made available from the union treasury.

Some way must be found to alleviate the desperate conditions under which these good American citizens are suffering.

I have made a personal appeal to John L. Lewis asking that he use his power and authority to relieve the misery of the miners' families.

I will contact Government agencies in the hope that aid can be extended to women and children who are hungry.

The Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee has before it a resolution of which I am a cosponsor. It calls upon the President to recognize the emergency that unquestionably exists. I appeared before the committee in support of that resolution and will continue to push for its passage by the Senate.

I have read your telegram and my reply on the floor of the Senate, and I am hopeful that this presentation of the situation will be productive of greater sympathy for the plight of the wives and children of the striking miners and will stimulate action in their behalf.

EDWARD MARTIN,
United States Senate.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I have written a letter today to John L. Lewis, setting forth the seriousness of the situation in the county of Pennsylvania to which I have referred, and I ask unanimous consent that my letter be made a part of the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. JOHN L. LEWIS,
International President,
United Mine Workers of America.

DEAR MR. LEWIS: This is a personal appeal to you to take such action as comes within your power and authority to relieve the desperate situation into which families of United Mine Workers have been forced by the present coal strike.

I know from personal knowledge and from numerous letters and telegrams that today thousands of women and children are hungry in Pennsylvania and in other coal mining areas.

The messages I have received cry out for relief from the misery that these innocent victims are suffering through no fault of their own.

Shall we stand idly by and permit these terrible conditions to continue until they reach the starvation stage?

Sincere concern with simple human needs demands that something be done without delay.

On behalf of the women and children who are without food I appeal to you to take prompt steps for the relief of their suffering.

With kind regards, believe me,

Very sincerely,

EDWARD MARTIN.

INFORMATION SOUGHT FROM THE STATE DEPARTMENT—THE FORMOSA SITUATION, ETC.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, as a further indication of the iron curtain which has been lowered between the activities of the State Department and the Congress of the United States, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a letter dated January 3, 1950, which I wrote to the Secretary of State asking for a copy of the memorandum of December 23 stating that Formosa had no strategic value. I might say that that information has not, up to this time, been furnished.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 3, 1950.

Hon. DEAN G. ACHESON,
Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I understand that under date of December 23 or thereabouts, the State Department issued a memorandum to various military attaches and others, indicating that Formosa could not be held for long and to do everything possible to prepare the public for the loss of the island and to stress the fact it was not needed for the strategic defense of the United States.

As a Member of the Senate Armed Services Committee and the Senate Appropriations Committee, I desire to have a copy of this memorandum at the earliest possible date.

With best personal regards, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I also ask to have printed in the body of the RECORD a copy of a letter dated January 7, 1950, in which I inquired of the Secretary of State the names of the persons who might have drafted the document, so that inquiries might be made as to their competence to make such determination, together with a letter dated January 17 from the Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, declining to furnish the information.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 7, 1950.

Hon. DEAN ACHESON,
Secretary of State,
State Department,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I called the State Department this morning to request the names of the committee which had been responsible for drafting the December 23 memorandum advising the State Department personnel that Formosa had no strategic value.

I first attempted to get Mr. Peurifoy in the Personnel Division, but he was out of the city and talked with Mr. Bryan and made the request of him. He said be had to take it up with higher authority. At about 11:15 this morning, I received a call from Mr. George Kennan who stated both Secretary Acheson and Under Secretary Webb were out of the city. However, he stated that the State Department itself assumed responsibility for any such information sent out and that he felt that he must decline to give me the names of the persons constituting the committee which drafted the document.

I emphasized to him that I felt that as a Member of the Senate of the United States I was entitled to this information and that while there might be some basis for the Department's position to decline to release a document which they themselves had classified, I could see no excuse for not furnishing a Member of Congress the names of such committee.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, January 17, 1950.

The Honorable WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR KNOWLAND: I have your letter of January 7 in which you refer to your effort to obtain the names of those responsible for drafting the December 23, 1949, memorandum, and to your conversation with Mr. George F. Kennan who advised you that he felt he could not furnish you with the information.

I fully agree with the position taken by Mr. Kennan that it would be inappropriate to release the names of the officials who participated in the drafting of this paper. I feel that I, as Secretary of State, have responsibility for the work of officials of the Department. Primary responsibility for this particular document, in my opinion, rests with me and secondary responsibility rests with Mr. Howland Sargeant, Acting Assistant Secretary of State in Charge of Public Affairs.

I hope you will agree with the position I have taken in this matter. The responsibility is mine and I fully accept it.

Sincerely yours,

DEAN ACHESON.

THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

RECOMMENDATIONS OF HOOVER COMMISSION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a statement which I have prepared and copies of various communications which I have received on the subject of the present recommendations of the Hoover Commission with regard to the Veterans' Administration. I ask unanimous consent that this material be printed at this point in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, Mr. WILEY'S statement and the communications were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OPPOSITION BY WISCONSIN VETERANS' GROUPS TO HOOVER PROPOSALS

Mr. President, the veterans of this Nation are deeply concerned about certain suggestions made by the Hoover Commission on veterans' affairs. These suggestions are found in House Document No. 92 of the Eighty-first Congress, first session.

The national commander of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled Veterans of World War II have all indicated their strenuous opposition to the Hoover proposals.

Some proposed changes, such as structural adjustments in the organization of the Veterans' Administration as recommended by the Hoover Commission, can be made without legislative enactment, at the discretion of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs or by decision of President Truman.

MANY PROPOSALS ON VA NOT YET STUDIED

Other proposals are the subject of legislation such as the idea of creating a veterans' insurance corporation which is embodied in H. R. 5171 and H. R. 5288 now pending before the House Veterans' Affairs Committee. Still other bills dealing with home-loan guaranties would have to be considered by the House Committee on Executive Expenditures. The most controversial of all the recommendations—the one dealing with the merging of Veterans' Administration services under a United Medical Administration (which would handle all of the other hospital services of the Federal Government)—that highly debatable suggestion would also have to be referred to the House Executive Expenditures Committee.

The above facts indicate that Congress has not as yet studied these various issues in detail, but will have to give its most serious attention to them.

Like my colleagues, I have received a tremendous number of fine letters, telegrams, and resolutions from veterans' groups in my State which express their deep concern over the net effect of the Hoover reports insofar as America's 18,000,000 ex-servicemen and their families are concerned.

I am sure that my associates and I are agreed that—

1. Congress should take no action which would impair the morale of our veterans or which would lead them to feel that the Government for which they fought and bled on a thousand battlefields has forgotten them.

2. Congress should take no action which would apply a misplaced economy ax arbitrarily into the very heart of veterans' services. We all recall the sorry days in the 1930's when veterans' pensions and other VA services were ruthlessly slashed by the Democratic administration while Government spending for other groups soared. We dare not break the faith with those who by their deeds of valor preserved this Nation.

VETERANS' GROUPS MUST BE HELPED

3. The judgment of the leading veterans' organizations in opposition to the Hoover reports is not one that any public official should lightly dismiss. On the contrary, these organizations, which perform so many services for our veterans, must be given the respect and the heed which their magnificent patriotic record so well deserves. The members of these veterans' groups are, of course, deeply concerned about the issue of Federal economy along with all our other citizens. But they feel as I do, that it would be misplaced economy for the Congress to take any action which would strike at the one group in this Nation—veterans and their families—which deserve the most and the best on the part of a grateful Government and people.

In order that my colleagues might have the benefit of the grass-roots reactions of veterans' posts, I ask unanimous consent that a few of the many splendid letters which I have received from all over Wisconsin be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

CRANDON, WIS., January 13, 1950.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: As county commander of Forest County, Wis., of the American Legion, I most earnestly request that you use your influence in defeating that portion of the Hoover Commission recommendations dealing with Veterans' Administration, hospitalization, medical care, and insurance. It appears that a thorough and impartial survey of hospital beds was not made, and also that the findings of the Commission relative to the operations of the insurance department were based on a hasty survey. While we do not want too much duplication of facilities, we also do not want the veteran to suffer at the hospital level. Your consideration of the veteran will be most gratifying.

Very truly yours,

VERN RUSSELL,
Forest County Commander, The American Legion, Department of Wisconsin.

TANNER-PAULL POST, No. 120,
THE AMERICAN LEGION,
West Allis, Wis.

Hon. Senator WILEY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: Your service and attention to our position on the Hoover report will be appreciated.

Our objection is confined to that portion which applies to the Veterans' Administration. United and firm we stand against this attempt to reduce the veteran and the Veterans' Administration to a state of ineffectiveness and confusion. We protest against the proposed dismemberment of the Veterans' Administration; against the inclusion of nonveteran groups in veterans' rights, and, in brief, against the full meaning of this section of the Hoover report.

We further emphasize that we do not take a stand against the other provisions in Mr. Hoover's report. We do oppose, with all our strength and vigor, the section dealing with the Veterans' Administration.

Your comprehensive analysis will, no doubt, be in close agreement with ours.

Thank you.

Yours respectfully,

BYRON STUART,
Commander.

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
KEWAUNEE COUNTY COUNCIL,
Kewaunee, Wis., January 17, 1950.

The Honorable ALEXANDER WILEY,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SENATOR: On behalf of the Kewaunee County (Wis.) Council of the American Legion, I respectfully request that you do all in your power to help defeat the recommendations of the Hoover Commission insofar as it pertains to the veteran. As commander of the Kewaunee County Council of the American Legion, I speak in behalf of approximately 800 veterans of both World Wars I and II, who at their last meeting on January 12, 1950, voted unanimously in their disapproval of the Hoover Commission Report insofar as it pertains to the veteran.

Many of the statements of the Hoover Commission pertaining to hospital facilities and the insurance program of the Veterans' Administration are false, as proven by investigations of the American Legion and other veterans' organizations.

We are opposed to placing the construction of veterans' hospitals under the Department of the Interior, taking of the entire medical program of the veteran from the Veterans' Administration and turning it over to a United Medical Administration, and the transferring of the life-insurance program from the Veterans' Administration to a contemplated Government insurance corporation.

The Hoover Commission is seeking to prevent further hospital construction for veterans on the basis that we now have in excess of 100,000 beds more than are required. When the members of the Hoover Commission were questioned by the representatives of the American Legion, relative to this so-called surplus, they could not state definitely where these so-called surplus beds were. Approximately 80 percent of the beds at all Veterans' Administration hospitals are occupied. To have more than 80 percent occupied continuously would leave an insufficient number of beds available for emergency cases. A portion of the 20 percent not fully occupied is also due to the daily turn-over at hospitals. To have a larger occupancy is not good medical practice. No doubt the Hoover Commission obtained their figures by counting beds in unoccupied hospitals constructed during the war as emergency hospitals for use during the war and immediately thereafter. Most of these emergency or temporary hospitals are not of a permanent type of construction. The Hoover Commission fails to report that the cost of equipping these temporary hospitals for present purposes is prohibitive that these temporary hospitals were never intended for rehabilitation purposes, and that for such use would cost more in the end than new facilities. Every veteran who has ever attempted to gain admission to a veterans' hospital for treatment knows that there is a long waiting list at practically every veterans' hospital. This proves that there is no surplus of hospital facilities for the treatment of veterans.

The Hoover Commission also presented various facts in regard to the efficiency of the insurance program of the Veterans' Administration. Although the Veterans' Administration has only 30 percent more employees proportionately to the average private insurance company, they handle 100 percent more insurance policies. Whereas each employee of a private insurance company handles on the average of 330 policies, each employee in the Veterans' Administration handles an average of 510 policies.

A private insurance company receives slightly less than two remittances per year for each policyholder, whereas the Veterans' Administration receives three times as many remittances a year from each policyholder. Most private insurance is written as whole life when subscribed to, whereas almost all Veterans' Administration policies begin as term insurance, necessitating later conversion. Due to the great dissimilarity of Government and private insurance, such comparison as above cannot be made with fairness to all concerned. However, since the Hoover Commission was critical of the administration of the Government insurance program, the above tends to disprove their claims.

It is the position of the Kewaunee County Council of the American Legion that creating a new corporation to take over the insurance program will not result in efficiency, and that the most efficient system is to continue with the Veterans' Administration supervising all veterans' affairs, insurance and others.

Therefore your aid is requested to defeat the recommendation of the Hoover Commission insofar as it pertains to the veteran.

Yours truly,

EDWARD E. BISELY,
Commander.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 25) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I intend to propose to the pending bill. It is very short. I ask that it be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk, without objection, will read the proposed amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, it is proposed to strike out lines 6 and 7 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within 5 years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress; and, if so satisfied, shall take effect upon the expiration of 1 year after the date of such ratification.

Mr. HAYDEN. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending joint resolution, and ask that it be read by the clerk, and that it be printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, between lines 4 and 5, it is proposed to insert the following:

The provisions of this article shall not be construed to impair any rights, benefits or exemptions conferred by law upon persons of the female sex.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, in opening the discussion on the pending joint resolution, I think it would not be inappropriate to refer in a general way to exactly what we are to do as the Senate.

Within the past few weeks I have received hundreds of communications, as I am sure every other Senator has, to this effect: "Please vote for the equal rights amendment to the Constitution," or, in some cases, "Please vote against the equal rights amendment to the Constitution."

It is unnecessary to recall to Senators that there is no authority vested in the Senate of the United States or the Congress of the United States to vote for or against an amendment to the Federal Constitution. Nor is there at any stage of the amendatory proceedings laid down in the Constitution, nor is there at any point, action by the Senate or the House of Representatives, or both, on the matter of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, the founding fathers, when they framed the Constitution, that remarkable document, in the first article stated that, "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

"All legislative powers." But those legislative powers must be exercised within the framework of the Constitution. If any legislative body assumes or attempts to act outside the purview of that limitation, our courts are established to pass upon whether or not they have exceeded their power.

I also desire to recall to the attention of Senators the fact that in the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, the Bill of Rights, there is the express reservation that "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Then, how, Mr. President, are we to tap that reservoir of power which the Constitution has reserved to the people? How is it to be tapped? Is the Constitution to be a strait-jacket down through the years in the form in which it was adopted?

The founding fathers recognized that situation, and provided methods for amendment, but they did not see fit to clothe the Congress of the United States with any power whatever to determine what amendments should be adopted or added to the Constitution. If they had wanted to place that power in the Congress, they would have done so. On the other hand, the mandatory machinery which was set up provided two distinct methods, both for the purpose of tapping this reservoir, and for that alone.

The first was that if Congress wishes to throw into gear machinery for finding out what the people think on a matter, then the Congress by a two-thirds vote of the respective bodies could tap this reservoir of amendatory power of the people. Their function is simply the matter of throwing into gear the tapping of the power which remains in the people.

The other method was that if two-thirds of the States wanted to initiate action and request the Congress to take action, they could do so; to pass on an amendment? No; not to pass on an amendment to the Constitution, but merely to provide the machinery for tapping this same reservoir by calling a constitutional convention of the States. At no point is there any power lodged in the Congress of the United States to pass on a question of an amendment to the Constitution.

Senator GUY M. GILLETTE, of Iowa, has no power, and will have no power, to vote on any amendment to the Constitution of the United States. GUY M. GILLETTE, citizen of Iowa, will have that right and will have that power, as will every other citizen of the United States, when it is presented to them for determination.

Nor, after the ratification by three-fourths of the States, is there any function to be performed by the Congress. As the States ratify, they deposit their ratifications with the Department of State, and when three-fourths of them have ratified, is any further action required on the part of the Congress? Not at all. A certification by the Secretary of State that the last ratification has been deposited makes an amendment a part of the Constitution.

Mr. President, in the consideration of a constitutional amendment proposed to be carried to the people, I can understand opposition to its provisions. There is now on the calendar of the Senate a proposed constitutional amendment, presented by the able junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], for changing the method of electing the President. I have very distinct doubts as to the wisdom of that proposed amendment, but, as a member of the Committee on Rules and Administration, I voted to report it to the Senate. When and if it is called up, I shall vote for submission of the amendment to the people. As I have said, I can understand an attitude of doubt, I can understand some qualms as to the wisdom of a proposed amendment, but—and I say this as emphatically as I can—I cannot understand any man wanting to question the right of the people to determine such a matter.

He either fears his fate too much,
Or his deserts are small,
That dares not put it to the touch,
To gain or lose it all.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I thank the Senator from Iowa for saying that he would be willing to see Senate Joint Resolution 2 considered and voted on, even though he himself does not think it has merit. I am glad he is willing to see it come before the Senate. I hope that it will come up, and that at that time I shall be able to convince the Senator from Iowa that it has merit. I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. GILLETTE. As I stated, I now repeat, while I have doubts, and the Senator may be able to dispel them in the discussion here, they would not deter me from voting for the submission of the amendment to the people. The very essence of democracy, the foundation stone under the whole foundation of our Government, is that if the people are given the right and oportunity to discuss matters of public import, to debate them, and to present opposing views, out of that discussion will be crystallized a decision that will be for the best interests of the people. To refuse to submit to them, not a capricious matter, but a matter of genuine concern, to me is to contravene and negate the very foundation on which we build our governmental structure, and to express distrust of it.

Mr. President, in commencing the dedate on Senate Joint Resolution 25, which proposes an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, I should like to try, if I can, to set this proposal in its historical context. I do not mean to say, nor do I wish the statement I have just made to be construed to mean, that the Congress should submit to the people every whimsical matter which may be presented to it; but where there exists such support of a question concerning the public welfare as to justify taking action upon it, or, as the Constitution says, to make it necessary that action upon it be taken, then of course I am convinced, and I think no one can deny, that the people have the right to pass on the question regardless of any individual views. That is why I refer to the historical background.

In the first place, of course, it is a rare occasion when the people of this country are offered the opportunity to amend the basic law. In the first half of this century the Constitution has been altered only six times. In fact, the twenty-first amendment merely repealed the eighteenth, leaving a net change of only four amendments added to the Constitution since the year 1870.

Secondly, this occasion marks the culmination of a 27-year legislative campaign in the Congress to reach a decision on submitting an equal-rights amendment to the States for ratification.

Thirdly, the proposal before the Senate is an expression of the ultimate objective of a popular movement that began more than 100 years ago, a steadily growing movement of both men and women which has sought to guarantee equal rights under the law for all citizens regardless of their sex. The nineteenth amendment, ratified in 1920, assured both male and female citizens of equal political rights as voters. It did not, however, assure them equal legal rights, and from that inadequacy has flowed as a corollary, the effort of the past quarter century to attain full constitutional recognition of the legal right of citizens, regardless of their sex, to be treated equally under the laws of the country.

Lastly, this sketch of the historical setting for the amendment would be incomplete without mention of its significance in the present world-wide ideological struggle between the advocates and the enemies of human rights. What we do here to guarantee equal rights under the law to all our citizens, men and women alike, cannot help but affect our country's success in the global battle to win men's minds away from tyranny and toward free society.

With these considerations in mind, Mr. President, I urge that the Senate move speedily to a decision to submit the proposed amendment to the people.

Mr. President, this joint resolution was introduced in Congress on January 13, 1949. Associated with me as cosponsors of the joint resolution are a very great number of Senators: The distinguished Senator from Maine [Mrs SMITH], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS], the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MARTIN], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ].

I interpolate at this point, Mr. President, that this morning the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] called me by telephone to express his very great regret that the state of his health would not permit him to be present to vote for the joint resolution, but he asked me as a favor to him again to state his deep interest in the measure and his desire to be present to support it.

At the time the joint resolution was submitted, the late distinguished Senator from North Carolina, Mr. Broughton, from Kansas, Mr. Reed, and from Idaho, Mr. Miller, were also sponsors. They have all passed from among us.

Thus, originally, the joint resolution was sponsored by a total of 33 Members of the Senate. Two additional Senators, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON], also signified to me their desire to participate as cosponsors of the joint resolution after it was already in print.

Many of us who are sponsoring this proposal in the Eighty-first Congress have been associated with similar efforts for equal rights in previous Congresses. It is one measure of the steadily increasing demand among the American people for this proposed constitutional amendment to find a much larger group of Senators participating in the presentation of the joint resolution in this Congress than ever before.

Not only in the Senate, but in the House as well, the trend has been toward an ever-greater support for a constitutional amendment to provide equal rights under the law for both men and women. This rising curve of support is a reflection of the ever-growing body of public opinion in the Nation at large for such constitutional amendment.

I feel sure it is not necessary—that indeed it would be an imposition on Senators—for me to trace the long struggle through which we have passed in trying to place before the country an amendment to the Constitution providing simply that equality of rights under the law shall not be abridged or denied on account of sex.

It is enough to note that this is the twenty-seventh consecutive year that this proposed amendment, in one form or another, has been before the Congress. Since 1923 there have been 26 different hearings on it—exhaustive hearings—in committees and subcommittees of both Houses of Congress. For 27 years the question has been examined, debated, reexamined and redebated again and again by our citizens and by their elected representatives. In my opinion, it is highly significant that each year a greater number of individuals and a greater number of organizations have endorsed the idea, that each year adds to the number of State legislatures which have memorialized the Congress in favor of the amendment, that each year more and more State Governors have urged its adoption.

It is noteworthy, too, I think, that today there are 10 Members of the Senate who in the past, while serving as Governors of their respective States, wrote strong endorsements of the equal-rights amendment. Of these former Governors now serving in the United States Senate, seven are cosponsors of the pending joint resolution. Their continued keen interest and their stanch support of equal rights for men and women are, to my mind, further evidence of the widespread and increasing favorable opinion in the Nation regarding the proposed amendment.

Not only has this issue been alive—very much alive—for more than a quarter of a century, but in the last two national elections both of the two major political parties wrote unequivocal endorsement of equal rights by constitutional amendment into their national platforms. Many of the Senators who worked in the drafting committees on the equal-rights plank for their respective party platforms are sitting in the Senate today.

The Republican Party platform of 1940, for example, stated:

> We favor submission by Congress to the States of an amendment to the Constitution providing for equal rights for men and women.

The 1944 Republican Party platform carried a plank in the same language as its 1940 platform.

The Democratic Party platform for the year 1944 declared:

> We recommend to Congress the submission of a constitutional amendment on equal rights for women.

Mr. President, I do not consider that absolutely binding on any Senator. While I go along with the major provisions of my party platform, as, in my opinion, representing on the whole, the better statement of my views on issues, I reserve my right as an individual not to be bound by every line and every paragraph. I simply cite the platform declarations for the purpose of showing that this is not a capricious, a whimsical matter we are presenting to the people, but that behind it is a volume of public interest and public pledge which justifies our giving the people a right to express themselves on the subject.

In the interim between the 1944 and the 1948 national elections, the Senate had an opportunity to vote on a joint resolution calling for submission of the equal-rights amendment to the States. The resolution received a majority of the votes cast at that time, in 1946, but lacked the necessary two-thirds majority, largely because of extremely heavy absences among its supporters in the last days of the session. Had every known supporter been in the country and present in the Senate when the vote was taken, the exact number of votes in the affirmative would have been 56—which is the same number of votes cast when the woman's-suffrage amendment received its final vote in this body.

The pressure of public opinion behind this equal-rights amendment did not abate, however, because of this temporary set-back. Quite the contrary. Responding to massive popular support, the national platforms of the two major parties in 1948 again declared in unequivocal terms the intention of the Republican and Democratic Parties to press for submission of an equal-rights amendment such as we are considering today. It is noteworthy that the equal-rights planks of the two parties in 1948 were written in almost identical language. Both parties favored submission of a constitutional amendment providing equal rights for women.

Thus, there is no possibility of anyone imagining that this is in any sense a partisan issue. A thoroughly bipartisan group of Senators has submitted the amendment as set forth in Senate Joint Resolution 25. This is no party issue; it cannot be, since we are dealing with the basic rights of human beings to which both our great parties are equally dedicated.

In the past session of the present Congress, on March 22, 1949, the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, for the first time, reported the resolution unanimously. Every member but one of that distinguished committee of able lawyers, was present and voted affirmatively. There can be no doubt whatever, at this late date, that the text of the proposed amendment has been minutely and meticulously scrutinized by the most capable and judicious legal minds in the Senate, both in past Congresses and in the present Congress. There was in the Seventy-eighth Congress a favorable Senate Judiciary report by Senators Austin, O'Mahoney, Kilgore, and McFarland; in the Seventy-ninth Congress, favorable Senate Judiciary Committee, report by Senator Hatch; in the Eightieth Congress, favorable Senate Judiciary Committee report by Senator Ferguson; in the Eighty-first Congress, favorable Senate Judiciary Committee report by Senator McCarran. There has never been an unfavorable report on the equal-rights amendment. Every legal and constitutional aspect of it has been weighed a score of times. And now at last we are to vote on this issue which has for so long been before the country and before the Congress.

The controlling argument, to my mind, which should guide us in our discussion of the proposed amendment is this: What we do here when we vote on this measure is to allow the people their democratic right to decide, themselves, through their State legislatures, whether or not they want to have the amendment ratified and made a part of the Constitution.

I do not stress the fact that the joint resolution must be passed by a two-thirds majority of both Houses of Congress, nor the fact that before the amendment can become part of the Constitution, it must, of course, be approved by three-fourths of the States.

The founding fathers of our country did not give Congress the authority to amend or change the Constitution.

In their wisdom, the men who drafted the Constitution placed the source of power in the people. The problem, then, was how to tap the reservoir of power in the people so as to make changes in the fundamental law from time to time as circumstances and exigencies might require.

Two methods to which I referred a moment ago were provided: One was by the people's initiative, expressed through the States, requesting Congress to call a Constitutional Convention for the purpose of amending the basic framework of law. This method was difficult and cumbersome. The other way provided that Congress should submit proposed amendments to the States, for the legislature of each State to determine whether it wanted to ratify or not.

The question before the Senate, then, is not "Shall we amend the Constitution?" I cannot repeat that too often. That question is not for us to decide. The States, with at least three-fourths of them concurring, if the amendment is to become part of the Constitution, must make the real decision. No, the question before us is simply this: "Should we now submit this amendment to the States for their decision?" If I were opposed—which I am not—to this amendment to the Constitution, I would vote for submission of the amendment to the people of the United States. I do not distrust the wisdom or judgment of the people of the United States. I do not have such a high regard for the wisdom of my own judgment that I will refuse to submit proposed constitutional amendments to my fellow citizens of the United States, to let them pass judgment in the way that the founding fathers, those who wrote the Constitution, said the people have a right to do.

In other words, our power of determination is limited to deciding whether or not the people should be permitted to express themselves locally in their own States on this issue.

Of course, it goes without saying that the Congress should not—and does not—submit to the people every capricious, whimsical, or captious notion that may be suggested to it. Not long ago, Mr. President, I stood on the floor and argued against the shipment in interstate commerce of colored oleomargarine. I argued as earnestly and as strongly as I knew how. But I would not think of submitting that question to the people of the United States as a constitutional amendment. More recently, we took up the basing-point conference report, a matter of tremendous importance to the people. But that is a legislative matter, not a matter to be submitted to the people as a proposed constitutional amendment. I would not favor doing so.

So, as I have said, Congress does not submit to the people every capricious, whimsical, or captious notion that may be suggested. But I am sure that no one will pretend today, after 27 years of public discussion of the equal-rights amendment, that the proponents of the present joint resolution are moved by caprice, whimsy, or crackpot faultfinding. Nothing new or startling is here being sprung upon the people. I hesitate, in fact, to guess how many pages of testimony are available concerning this long-sought amendment, how many volumes have been written to enlighten the people about it, how many public speeches have been made about it in every State of the land.

Mr. President, I mention here some of the many national organizations which have endorsed the amendment: The National Woman's Party, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the National Education Association of the United States, the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, the National Association of Women Lawyers, the American Medical Women's Association, the Osteopathic Women's National Association, the National Association of School Secretaries, the National Council of Women Chiropractors, Association of American Women Dentists, the American Federation of Soroptimist Clubs—the largest association of women in our country, the National Association of Colored Women, the Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, the Congress of State Societies, the Pilot International, the Alpha Iota Sorority, the Wheel of Progress, Delta Phi Epsilon, the Quota International.

The biennial convention of the National Council of Women of the United States, in May 1946, recommended that its member organizations request the Congress of the United States to follow democratic procedure by submitting the important question of the equal status of women, as embodied in the equal-rights amendment, to the States for action.

Furthermore, hundreds of State, regional, and local organizations of women representing social, political, industrial, business, and religious groups, have endorsed the amendment.

Mr. President, I pause here to say that I understood that there was presented, or was about to be presented, a statement from leading women jurists opposing this amendment. On Saturday, I received the following telegram from Judge Marion J. Harron, whose name appeared or is to appear, if and when that statement is filed:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 20, 1950.
Senator GUY M. GILLETTE,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.:

My name erroneously included in list submitted by committee. Status of women dated January 13 as opposed to Senate Joint Resolution 25, equal-rights amendment, letter, and list may be inserted CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Please request deletion of my name from list of opponents. As a citizen I support equal-rights amendment to guarantee civil rights for all women uniformly in United States and I also support American minimum standards for labor in American industry. Our Nation has advanced beyond both types of nineteenth century backwardness; there cannot be a lasting conflict under law between these two principles if by constitutional amendment equal rights under law for all citizens is established. The temporary period of legal clarification of local statutes after equal-rights amendment is adopted will require relatively small effort and should not prevent the uniting of all women in a common effort for the good of all citizens. You may insert this in RECORD.

Respectfully,

MARION J. HARRON.

Mr. President, I am persuaded that anyone who, after the many years this problem has been before us, still hesitates to submit the amendment to the States is negating the very spirit of the Constitution. Either he mistrusts his own position in the matter and does not dare put it to the test of popular referendum in the States or he is arrogating to himself the aristocratic prerogative of dictating to the people what they shall and what they shall not be allowed to vote upon.

The latter assumption of superior wisdom, I suggest, is an echo from the eighteenth century. It finds its parallel in the attitude of those who, in the early decades of our Nation's life, disdained to trust the intelligence of the people in great public matters affecting their life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness. The aristocratic caste of mind, a heritage of British colonial rule, found expression in the days before adoption of the Constitution in remarks such as one made by John Jay to Washington. Jay said:

The mass of men are neither wise nor good.

Or again, the statement made by James Madison to John Randolph in 1788:

There are subjects to which the capacities of the bulk of mankind are unequal and on which they must and will be governed by those with whom they happen to have acquaintance and confidence.

And Washington himself, in a fit of depression, wrote in 1786:

Mankind, when left to themselves, are unfit for their own government.

Alexander Hamilton, who was the epitome of that type of thinking, said:

Unfortunately, they have truth on their side, who say that the great mass of mankind cannot be trusted with decisions for their own welfare. The decisions had better be made by those who, by birth, education, or knowledge, are better enabled to determine what is in their interest, than are the people themselves.

Mr. President, is there any Member of the Senate of the United States at the present time who is of that caste of intellect? Is there among us anyone who is going to subscribe to that thought, which is back of every imperialism the world has ever known—the thought that one group of people can better determine what is best for those whom they consider an inferior group. I shall not refuse to submit for decision any question involving the public interest and welfare to the people of the United States.

We have left far behind the type of society which fostered the aristocratic mentality exemplified in the quotations I have just given. Today, I venture to say, the prevailing attitude in this country—in Government and out—is quite the opposite. Our concept is that, given all the facts, the people will choose, by and large, what is right and what is best.

Mr. President, our function here is to permit the people in each of the 48 States to act upon this proposal, according to the provisions of the Constitution, as they may see fit to act. By this constitutional and traditional method of amendment—which preserves the right of every State, as I have always sought to have States' rights preserved—the joint resolution not only must pass the House, after leaving us, but must be ratified by at least 36 of the 48 States.

I may say in that connection, Mr. President, that under that machinery anyone who is opposed to the amendment, who has doubt as to its wisdom, can go before the people of his jurisdiction, the people of his State, to make his opposition known. I may also say that under the securities established by the amendatory process, 11 States—1 of them being the wonderful State which the Senator who occupies the chair at this time [Mr. HOLLAND] so ably represents—the 11 States, with the addition of 2 of the so-called border States, Oklahoma, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri, or any other State, could block this or any other amendment to the Constitution. There is no invasion of security. There is no invasion of the rights of the people to express themselves. On the contrary, it is an attempt to open the door by which the reservoir of power which is in the people can be expressed in amending their organic and fundamental law.

Thus everyone who so desires will have his opportunity to debate the proposal when it comes to the several State legislatures. Every citizen will have his chance to understand and evaluate the provisions and effects of the amendment. Each State will be able to determine to its own satisfaction—far better than we can do here—whether it wishes to ratify or not. And there is no reason whatever to suppose that in this case there will be any less opportunity for discussion and understanding than in the case of the various other constitutional amendments that have been submitted in the past.

This is the democratic process—or, if you prefer, the process of representative government—at its best.

As I have said, for me the most compelling reason to vote for Joint Resolution 25 is my profound and unshakable conviction that the time has now come to permit the people of this country to decide locally, in their State legislatures, whether or not they wish to have the equal-rights amendment become part of the Constitution, in order that equal justice will be accorded to all our citizens and the present defects in this regard be corrected.

In a brief submitted to the Senate Judiciary Committee August 15, 1941, by the late George Gordon Battle, distinguished New York lawyer, the question of harmony of this amendment with our system of government was discussed as follows:

It seems strange that there should be any question that all citizens of a republic should have equal rights. Our Supreme Court has repeatedly enunciated this great principle. For example:

"The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism. Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power" (U. S. v. Cruikshank (92 U. S. 542, 595)).

Those are the words of Chief Justice Waite, one of the greatest jurists who ever sat upon the bench of the highest court. The same principle has been enunciated in hundreds of cases in the Supreme Court and other Federal courts and in the State courts of this country.

I will say in all sincerity—as I am sure many other Senators would say—that even if I were personally opposed to the amendment—which I most certainly am not—I would now vote, after 27 years of public discussion and 27 years of congressional examination of all conceivable aspects of the question, to allow the people their democratic and constitutional right to vote on it.

Mr. President, the merits of the proposed constitutional amendment are fully known. Likewise, every objection to it has long since been thoroughly analyzed. I am familiar with these objections and with the humane motivations which have persuaded certain others to pose them. But, I submit, these objections have more often than not been found to be based on a mistaken notion of the purpose and effects of the amendment. And, most often, too, when these mistaken notions have been swept away by clear and careful explanation, those who held them formerly have become strong advocates, rather than opponents, of the equal-rights amendment.

It seems doubtful, in any case, that anything new in the way of argument either for or against the measure can now be put forward. Nevertheless, those of us—and there are many—who have worked for this proposal for so many years are deeply concerned not only that it be submitted to the States for ratification, but also that everyone will be perfectly clear as to its meaning and its purpose.

This amendment, Mr. President, is concerned with rights. For some this may be the crux of the matter. Its subject is equal rights. It does not, as many suppose, deal with men or women. It deals with governments and the law made by governments. Furthermore, it is not concerned with rights in the abstract, but with a specific set of rights: rights under the law.

Here, in the simplest terms, is what the amendment does. It prohibits inequality of rights under the law on account of sex. It grants no new, as yet unheard-of rights. It says that neither the Federal Government nor the State governments shall deny equality of rights under the law on the mere ground of sex. This is most certainly a rigid limitation upon its applicability.

The amendment in no way suggests uniformity of laws among the States. What it does suggest—what it insists upon—is that no law passed by either the National Congress or by any State legislature shall be constitutional if that law denies equality of rights on account of sex.

Today, of course, that condition which we seek to attain does not prevail in all of our States, although their laws have gone far in the direction of equality of rights. Furthermore, where equality exists because of statutory provisions, there is no guaranty that it will be maintained in the future. Such a guaranty can be made only by writing it into the Constitution of the United States.

We prize and revere our Constitution—and people the world over envy us for it—because it gives to every man certain basic rights which cannot be taken away by the whim of any individual or any legislative body. The inequality based on grounds of sex which today persists in our laws is an anomaly, part of the heritage of a less civilized past. This in equality bears, of course, more heavily against those of the feminine sex, and what the women of this country are asking is that they too be brought under the same general provisions that apply to men, that they be guaranteed equality of rights by the Constitution.

The fourteenth and the nineteenth amendments, as interpreted by the courts, have been insufficient to provide equality of rights as between men and women. The situation requires a constitutional amendment to clarify the application of the earlier amendments.

The Supreme Court decided that women did not qualify as citizens under the fourteenth amendment. It was therefore necessary to adopt the nineteenth amendment providing that the right to vote shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex. Yet, that amendment did not thereby assure equal rights under the law regardless of sex. Otherwise the discriminatory laws that now obtain in some States would have long since been declared unconstitutional and repealed. The necessity for this clarifying and more-inclusive amendment is apparent to the vast majority of our people. That is why we are being asked to permit them, through their State legislatures, to act on it.

In the years of debate that have preceded our present discussion, a considerable number of false assumptions have been made with regard to the proposal. Let me say that the amendment will not have and certainly is not intended to have the results which some have pretended that it will have.

The proposed amendment does not attempt to claim that people of different sexes are identical. Even men who have equal rights one with the other, under the Constitution, are not thereby made identical; but they do have the right to equal treatment as individuals before the law. Thus, this amendment guaranteeing equal rights to persons regardless of their sex does not mean declaring them to be identical human beings. That we could not do. Rather, all are assured the same rights under the law, the right to be treated as legally equal to each other. Likewise, it would preclude that a whole sex be treated on an unequal basis.

Once the amendment is made part of the Constitution, it will in the future protect man as it will protect woman before the law—neither more nor less.

It will guarantee, as I have tried to show, that laws made in the future shall contain no discrimination based on sex.

When the amendment is finally adopted neither man nor woman will, I believe, find reason for complaint. Of course, man, under this amendment, is bound to lose the privileged position he has held in society since the earliest days of civilization, but that privileged position cannot be defended, in all justice, under our form of government. Man, who has been, so to speak, a feudal lord in the domain of his family, will lose his superior prerogatives. But he will lose none of his rights as a citizen of this free country.

The miracle of this constitutional change is that it benefits those who have never had full justice assured them, yet it does so without in any way infringing the rights of others.

Another virtue of this proposal is that it is a self-disciplining measure. No police, no snoopers, no horde of Federal agents will be spawned by it. Where necessary, the legislatures will make alterations in certain laws to conform with the new constitutional provision. The amendment provides time for that. Where necessary, the courts will, of course, test the constitutionality of acts against the new provision. This is another reason why I say the amendment is not concerned with people, but with rights—with rights under laws made by governments.

Now as to the proposition that we have heard advanced that this amendment will wipe from the statute books the so-called protective legislation which has been written on behalf of women I think it proper to point out certain facts. The amendment would not deprive the States of the power to classify for the protection of the health, safety, morals, and welfare of the community. In short, it simply assures that this classification shall not be based on the grounds of sex.

The only way the power of the States would be touched would be that they could no longer establish the arbitrary basis of sex as a classification. They would be bound by the restrictions now applying to legislation affecting men—that classifications shall not be arbitrary or unreasonable or capricious. The Supreme Court, in speaking of limitations on the power to classify, has said in Connally v. Union Sewer Pipe Co. (184 U. S. 540):

> In prescribing regulations for the conduct of trade, (legislation) cannot divide those engaged in trade into classes and make criminals of one class if they do certain things, while allowing another and favored class engaged in the same domestic trade to do the same things with impunity. * * * Such a statute is not a legitimate exercise of the power of classification, rests upon no reasonable basis, is purely arbitrary, and plainly denies the equal protection of the laws to those against whom it discriminates.

All men now have equal rights under the law. But hundreds of distinctions have been made among men with respect to the varying degree of their duties, whether it is a matter of wartime service or the progressive income tax. Nonetheless, before the law, all men stand equal. This amendment simply proposes to have women stand beside men in that same equality before the law.

There is no question here of forcing anyone, man or woman, to do that which he or she has neither the mental qualifications nor the physical ability to do. We are here dealing with the rights of persons, with their dignity, and with the relationships of persons to the society in which they live. Our goal is to establish a guaranty that this relationship shall be one of equal dignity.

The amendment does not remove from Congress or from any State the power to make reasonable classifications in order to protect persons of a special category by socially desirable legislation. Under the amendment all labor laws would necessarily be equal for men and women, but this would not mean the lowering of labor standards for both sexes. It is probable that the higher standards of women—which are a real handicap to women when not applied to their male competitors—would be extended to cover workers of both sexes. I may say in that connection, the claim is sometimes made that certain restrictive measures are for the protection of women, which at the same time deprive them of an opportunity for employment they could otherwise have, and in which they could serve with credit. This decision would be in the hands of each State. Equality under the law does not require the abolition of humane laws. Safety and health laws should apply to all workers in a given industry and should be based on the kind of work done, not on the sex of the worker.

A classification should be made on grounds of physical endurance, not on grounds of sex. An analogy, perhaps, can be made with the case of law, let us say, requiring a rest period during working time for all men over the age of 60. Such a classification would be based on the presumed differences in endurance of older and younger men. Yet no one pretends that authorizing this rest period destroys the equal rights of all men before the law.

I have always felt that the question of protective legislation should be handled, not on a basis of the sex of the people one wishes to protect, but from the standpoint of the benefit to the whole population. If we desire to protect some persons against noxious fumes, poor lighting, overwork, unhealthy conditions, and so forth, we should also seek to protect all who work from these threats to their well-being.

Our problem, primarily, is to submit to the States an amendment that will establish the principle of equality of legal rights for all persons in America, regardless of whether they happened to be born male or female. Of course, if by judicial interpretation, after adoption of the proposed amendment, the trend to eliminate unhealthy working conditions for men is accelerated, then I am sure that few of us will regret such an interpretation. In my judgment, the passage of this amendment will accelerate a move toward better working conditions based on the need of the workers, not on their sex.

Mr. President, the purpose and intent of this amendment are clear beyond any doubt or cavil: it is to establish a constitutional guaranty of equal treatment under the law of all our people, regardless of whether they are men or women. So simply stated, it perhaps does not seem revolutionary to us, since we in America are accustomed, in our everyday life, to treat others on the basis of equality and respect for their human dignity. Yet, in large parts of the world where the old feudal patterns of life, with their subjugation of women as a class, still have so powerful a grip, this proposal would be unthinkable and beyond comprehension.

In a society based as ours is, however, on the worth of each individual human being, adoption of the equal-rights amendment will be only one more step in the long series of efforts by the American people to liberate themselves completely and forever from legal concepts of the outworn feudal order of Europe which we have already left so far behind in the political and economic fields.

It is only natural that America, the country that has most successfully and completely freed itself from the dead hand of the feudal past, should sweep away the basis for the last remaining legal discriminations based on sex, and, by adopting this constitutional amendment, assure that "equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of sex."

When I made the statement that it is fitting that America should continue to take the lead, as she has taken it, I may add that it was with considerable shame I learned that in a conference held at Bogota, Colombia, a conference of American Republics, from March 30 to May 2, 1948, two treaties covering the rights of women were approved by the plenary session. The first treaty provided that among the American Republics the right to vote and hold national office should not be denied on account of sex. The second provided that "The American States agree to grant to women the same civil rights which men enjoy."

The delegation from Uruguay proposed, at first, that there be one single treaty embodying declarations of the rights of women in both political and civil matters.

The United States delegation, however, stated that our country was unable to sign such a treaty because in the United States only political rights have been guaranteed by the national Constitution. Our delegation declared:

> Under our constitutional system, the rights of the National Government are strictly separate from those of the 48 States. A constitutional amendment was required in order to extend to women equal political rights with respect to voting * * *. This action was required because under our constitutional system voting qualifications had been controlled previously by the separate States. With regard to civil rights, almost all of them are * * * controlled in the United States by State law rather than Federal law. Because of this situation the United States can at this time support an inter-American convention which includes only the right to vote and hold national office.

The United States delegation stated that the United States alone, of the republics of the Western Hemisphere, had not afforded equal civil rights to women, and could not sign a treaty such as the other 20 republics of the Western Hemisphere could sign. I thought, Mr. President, that that was a matter which should challenge the attention of each and every one of us. We fancy ourselves to be the leaders in human advancement, the leaders in the Pan American Union, but we alone were unable to sign such a treaty. I hope that when such a treaty is again proposed in an assembly of American Republics, the United States will not be precluded from signing along with the other enlightened nations of the Western Hemisphere a treaty of that kind.

Mr. President, in conclusion, let me say that the Senate is approaching a decision of great historical significance. The international implications of this decision in a world of conflicting values cannot be underestimated. The enormously widespread support of this amendment cannot be denied. The desirability of reinforcing the foundations of our free society cannot be ignored. The amendment we propose is practicable, necessary, and just. What we have to do now, after nearly three decades of debate, and in the light of the ever greater and ever broader popular demand for it—as expressed in the platforms of the two major parties, in the memorials from the State legislatures, in the eagerness of large numbers of Members of both Houses to vote on it—what we have to do now is pass Joint Resolution 25 and send it to the House of Representatives so that from there, in turn, it may go to the States for their approval.

One word more in closing, Mr. President. As I have been speaking here, my mind has gone back to the time when I was a State senator in Iowa, when the nineteenth amendment was under consideration. As a fledgling senator, I sat there and heard the nineteenth amendment discussed. I heard arguments which many of the older Senators will remember, to the effect that we cannot bring woman down from the pedestal which she now occupies — our sweet womanhood—drag her into smoke-filled rooms, into the gutters of ward politics, and see our mothers or our sisters besmirched by such contact. It was argued that it would be destructive of all we cherished in womanhood.

I heard the proponents say, "If we bring woman into politics it will clean politics up. We shall have no more conditions in politics of which to be ashamed. Women, when they participate in politics, will clean up the situation as it has never been cleaned before."

It was all fallacy, and we know it was fallacy.

Women were accorded the right to vote. They did not clear politics of all that was reprehensible and bad. Neither were they dragged down so that we lost our respect for womanhood.

So the arguments which have been made in the recent past are reminiscent of the debates held at that time.

Mr. President, there is only one function we have to perform, whether or not we think this is a wise amendment. We have to determine whether it is a measure in which there is sufficient interest to submit it to the great reservoir of power provided as the source of amendatory process so that we may have the question determined.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, I am in favor of the proposed equal-rights amendment to the Constitution for the very reason which causes some women to oppose it. Throughout my service in Congress, I have clung steadfastly to the belief that when women demand equal rights with men they must give up their special feminine privileges. I have urged that in connection with all women's legislation, because women are just as subject as men to the old saying that you cannot have your cake and eat it, too.

But in supporting the equal-rights amendment, I can appreciate some of the difficulties. These difficulties must be overcome, and that may take time. But the more we delay, the harder it will be ever to achieve the objective.

This is not a petticoat measure. It is a measure designed to give fuller meaning and expression to the traditional American way of life. We have heard a great deal about civil rights and no discrimination against anyone because of race, color, or creed. I would add one thing to that no-discrimination code of civil rights—sex. I say that there should not be any discrimination against any person because of race, color, creed—or sex. But I say with equal conviction that neither race, nor color, nor creed, nor sex must be permitted to be the basis for agitation for special rights and special treatment under the guise of no discrimination and equality. There is a danger of losing balance on this subject, and in our zeal for equality to demand unwittingly and grant special treatment and privileges over and above equality.

I think it is high time that we stopped thinking of women as being second-class citizens, as people with less qualifications than men, and secondary in priority. There should be no such thing as priority for or against women or men.

I think that the most effective argument for equal rights is summed up in three simple words—"women are people." One who thinks that over just a little will see the justice and overwhelming merit of the equal-rights measure.

In closing, I desire to pay my respects and express my appreciation to those Senators who are going to vote for the pending measure even though they do not believe in equal rights. In the first place, I respect their opinion even though they differ with me. But more than that, I admire the fair and unselfish attitude they have taken by saying that they are voting for the joint resolution so that the amendment may be referred to the States for ratification or rejection, to give the people of America a more direct vote and voice on this issue. Some of these Senators will fight equal rights back in their States on the question of ratification or rejection. But by male standards they will have manfully faced an issue, rather than have sought to bottle that issue up in Congress without the States having had an opportunity to voice themselves on the proposal.

NOMINATION OF ADMIRAL FORREST P. SHERMAN TO BE CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, as I promised, I think it was on last Thursday, to discuss some aspects of the Denfeld-Sherman matter, I should assume that the Senators who were present on the floor at that time would desire to be here today to hear the report which I promised to get.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall be glad to yield if I will not lose the floor.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may yield without losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request that after a quorum has been developed the Senator from Maryland shall have the floor? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hill	Martin
Anderson	Hoey	Maybank
Benton	Holland	Millikin
Brewster	Humphrey	Mundt
Bridges	Hunt	Myers
Butler	Ives	Neely
Byrd	Jenner	O'Conor
Cain	Johnson, Colo.	O'Mahoney
Capehart	Johnson, Tex.	Pepper
Chapman	Johnston, S. C.	Robertson
Connally	Kefauver	Russell
Cordon	Kem	Saltonstall
Donnell	Kerr	Schoeppel
Douglas	Kilgore	Smith, Maine
Downey	Knowland	Sparkman
Dworshak	Langer	Stennis
Eastland	Leahy	Taft
Ecton	Lehman	Taylor
Flanders	Lodge	Thomas, Utah
Frear	Long	Thye
Fulbright	Lucas	Tobey
George	McCarran	Tydings
Gillette	McCarthy	Vandenberg
Graham	McClellan	Watkins
Green	McFarland	Wherry
Gurney	McKellar	Wiley
Hayden	McMahon	Williams
Hendrickson	Magnuson	Withers
Hickenlooper	Malone	Young

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MAGNUSON in the chair). A quorum is present.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, last week in a discussion on the floor concerning the filling of the place of Chief of Naval Operations to which Admiral Forrest Sherman had been nominated by the President, and whose nomination had been favorably reported to the Senate, the question arose as to whether there was a vacancy in this office. There was exhibited on the floor of the Senate an alleged commission which Admiral Denfeld allegedly held, and therefore it was assumed from these facts, as I recall the argument, that perhaps no vacancy existed, and therefore the nomination of Admiral Sherman could not be acted upon.

In the course of the colloquy which subsequently took place I told the Members of the Senate that I cared not to discuss the matter that day on the floor, because new points of fact had been raised, but that I would diligently set about trying to secure all the pertinent facts which would throw light on the controversy and bring them before the Senate at the earliest possible moment.

Immediately thereafter I went to the telephone and found that Secretary Matthews was in Omaha, Nebr. I related to him over the telephone what had happened, and told him I should like a complete chronological account of what had taken place.

I likewise communicated with the Secretary of Defense and repeated that request. I also said to him that I should like the action which had been taken in regard to the Denfeld and Sherman equation brought to the attention of the legal counsel of the Navy Department and that a complete legal opinion supporting the action taken be sent to me so I could read it to the Senate.

Both of these documents are now in my possession, and I shall read them to the Senate so the Senate may have the facts as they have come to me not only in the letters and communications I shall read, but as a matter of independent investigation on my own part.

I now request my colleagues not to interrupt me until I have finished reading the communications, so I may present the matter in an orderly, chronological, and, I hope, completely factual way. At the conclusion of the reading of the matter I have in my hand I shall be very glad to submit myself to interrogation in an attempt to answer any questions that may be asked.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, before the Senator starts, will he submit to a question?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is contrary to what I just requested.

Mr. BRIDGES. It is for that reason I want to interrupt the Senator now—so as not to do so while he is reading the communications.

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. Does the Senator intend to preclude hearings before the Armed Services Committee, with Secretary Matthews present?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is a subject the Senator from Maryland cannot answer because it would have to be the result of committee action.

Mr. BRIDGES. As the Senator well knows, Secretary Matthews made statements before the Armed Services Committee, in connection with the matter now before the Senate. It is my thought that Secretary Matthews would want to come before the same committee personally to present his case, because it was before that committee he made statements which have since proved to be false.

Mr. TYDINGS. But it was not before the Armed Services Committee that the Secretary of the Navy was said to be either misstating the truth or to be incompetent; therefore the Senator from Maryland thinks the Secretary ought to be "tried," if I may use that word, in the same tribunal in which the charges against him were filed, and that is in the United States Senate.

After the documents I hold in my hand have been read, interrogation of the Senator from Maryland will be in order, but for the time being the Senator from Maryland would rather present the facts before he answers the interrogation of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BRIDGES. Very well. Thereafter the Senator will yield on that point?

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator then asks me.

I now read:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
January 23, 1950.

MY DEAR SENATOR TYDINGS: Much to my regret, I was absent from Washington last Wednesday when the discussion over the existence of a vacancy in the office of Chief of Naval Operations and the official issuance of a commission to Admiral Denfeld for reappointment as Chief of Naval Operations for a second term beginning December 15, 1949, was renewed on the floor of the Senate.

The facts pertinent to those two questions are as follows: I stated before the Armed Services Committee of the Senate on January 12:

First. That in my opinion there was a vacancy in the office of Chief of Naval Operations at the time Admiral Sherman was given an interim appointment and assumed office on November 2, 1949;

Second. That the commission for Admiral Denfeld's second appointment for a term of 2 years was never issued to him.

Those statements were made to the committee in good faith. I am of the opinion that they were then, and still are, correct and truthful.

The questions of the existence of a vacancy in the office of Chief of Naval Operations on November 2, 1949, and of Admiral Denfeld's occupancy of that office under an appointment for a second 2-year term are questions of fact and of law.

It is a fact that on my recommendation, President Truman, on October 27, 1949, authorized me as Secretary of the Navy to arrange "the transfer of Admiral Denfeld to other important duties" from the office of Chief of Naval Operations.

A copy of my letter of recommendation to the President and of his written approval of the recommendation and authorization to carry it out are attached to this letter.

Let me say parenthetically that I shall presently read them.

In complying with the President's instructions, the following order was directed to Admiral Denfeld by me as Secretary of the Navy:

NOVEMBER 1, 1949.

From: Secretary of the Navy.
To: Admiral Louis E. Denfeld, United States Navy.
Subject: Orders.

1. Upon receipt of these orders you will stand relieved of your duties as Chief of Naval Operations.

2. You will report to the Secretary of the Navy for duty pending further assignment.

By direction of the President.

FRANCIS P. MATTHEWS.

(First endorsement)

NOVEMBER 2, 1949.

From: Secretary of the Navy.
To: Admiral Louis E. Denfeld, United States Navy.

1. Reported this date.

FRANCIS P. MATTHEWS.

The effect of these orders of November 1—

The orders I have just read—and the endorsement thereon dated November 2 was to accomplish the removal of Admiral Denfeld as Chief of Naval Operations.

The only way in which the existence of a vacancy could be questioned is by an attack on the constitutional power of the President, as Commander in Chief, to create such a vacancy.

Attached to this letter is a brief of the law applicable to that legal problem. Its reading clearly establishes the unquestionable power of the President to remove a Chief of Naval Operations from office at any time. It follows that a vacancy was created in the Office of Chief of Naval Operations on November 1, 1949.

On November 2, 1949, Admiral Sherman under an interim appointment by the President took the oath of office as Chief of Naval Operations in my office, in the presence of Admiral Denfeld, myself, and a number of other spectators. No protest to the assumption of the office by Admiral Sherman was made by Admiral Denfeld or by anyone acting in his behelf. Admiral Denfeld publicly congratulated Admiral Sherman and wished him "good luck."

Under the facts and the law, there can be no question but that Admiral Sherman legally became Chief of Naval Operations on November 2, 1949.

Since it is clear that Admiral Denfeld was legally removed during his first term as Chief of Naval Operations—a term for which he received a valid commission in 1947, and ceased to be Chief of Naval Operations more than a month prior to the expiration of his first term, the question of whether he received a valid commission for his second term is beside the point. However, in view of the fact that the question of the second-term commission has been the subject of so much misunderstanding and discussion, I am outlining below all of the relevant details with respect to that commission.

To aid in a proper consideration of what now follows, permit me to quote Webster's definition of the meaning of the verb "issue." Quote: "'Issue': to send out officially, to deliver by authority."

In my testimony before the Armed Services Committee of the Senate on January 12, 1950, the members of the committee and I were discussing official action; therefore, when I stated to the committee that a commission of appointment had never been issued to Admiral Denfeld, we all understood that to mean "officially" issued.

Unless officially transmitted to Admiral Denfeld by authorized procedure with proper authority, his possession of a commission for a second term of 2 years would have no legal effect whatever.

It is important, then, to consider how it happens that the commission which was drafted and signed by the President and the Secretary of the Navy to be used on the occasion when Admiral Denfeld was expected to qualify for his second term as Chief of Naval Operations by taking oath of office on December 5, 1949 was irregularly placed in his custody.

The fact that a commission for a second term of office as Chief of Naval Operations is in Admiral Denfeld's possession was not known to me until it was disclosed on the floor of the United States Senate.

However, I never at any time, anywhere, stated that I had not signed such a commission. Statements made on the floor of the Senate that I had so testified before the Armed Services Committee on January 12 are not verified by the record of that hearing. I at all times knew full well that I had signed not only one, but two, commissions, as what follows hereafter will disclose.

The procedure established by the Navy for handling commissions and presidential appointments is as follows:

When notice is received that such an appointment has been confirmed, the Bureau of Naval Personnel prepares the following papers:

(a) Letter of transmittal from the Secretary of the Navy to appointee;

(b) Written acceptance of office to be signed by appointee;

(c) Written oath of office to be taken and signed by appointee;

(d) Commission of appointment, to be issued to appointee after oath of office has been taken and signed by appointee.

Following its preparation, the commission is submitted to the Secretary of the Navy for his signature. When signed, it is forwarded to the White House for submission to the President for his signature. When signed by the President, the commission is returned to the Office of the Secretary of the Navy, and then referred to the Bureau of Personnel where the seal of the Navy is placed on the document after it is signed by the President, as required by law.

The commission is then kept in the custody of the Secretary of the Navy with papers (a), (b), and (c) referred to above, until time to use them when the oath of office is administered to the appointee as he assumes his duties at the beginning of his term. At that time the appointee is given the letter of transmittal by the Secretary of the Navy. He signs the acceptance of his office, takes the oath of office, signs it, and then the Secretary of the Navy officially delivers him the commission investing him with the authority of his office.

This well-established procedure was not followed with respect to the commission now said to be in Admiral Denfeld's possession.

Its history, I am told, is as follows:

When notification was received of Admiral Denfeld's confirmation by the Senate on August 15, last, the Bureau of Naval Personnel, as a routine matter, prepared a commission and submitted it to me, and I signed it. It was then forwarded to the White House. On its arrival there, Rear Admiral Dennison, Naval Aide to the President, examined it and disapproved of its physical appearance. On his own initiative, he arranged for a new form of commission, bearing the same words contained in the form he disapproved—

Parenthetically, let me say that I understand the second commission was on parchment—to be prepared by a competent script writer. On its completion—

That is to say, on the completion of the second commission—

he returned the newly written commission to my office, where I affixed my signature as Secretary of the Navy, and returned it to the White House to have the President's signature affixed. I was informed by Rear Admiral Dennison on January 19 last—

That was 3 or 4 days ago—that he secured the President's signature to the commission on September 13, 1949.

Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY] will not leave the Chamber while I am reading this letter. I got it at his request.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I assure the Senator from Maryland that I am not leaving. I have a number of questions to ask. I must get some further documents so that I can give the Senator some proof which obviously he does not have at this time.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well; I see.

I continue to read the letter:

Rear Admiral Dennison also stated to me that on September 14, again on his own initiative, he took the commission direct to Admiral Denfeld's office in the Pentagon.

That is to say, from the White House directly to Admiral Denfeld, not back to the Secretary of the Navy.

I read further:

Rear Admiral Dennison stated that he did not make an official delivery of the document to Admiral Denfeld because, first, he did not have the authority to make official delivery, and, secondly, he did not have the supporting papers which were necessary to constitute official delivery.

The first I knew that the commission had been delivered by Rear Admiral Dennison to Admiral Denfeld was when Rear Admiral Dennison told me during our conversation on Thursday morning, January 19. The President, after signing the commission, had no information regarding any of the details of the delivery of the commission to Admiral Denfeld.

I may say here, parenthetically, the President did not order it to be done that way; the Secretary of the Navy did not do it; the admiral, for reasons perfectly understandable to those of us who have been in the military service, and others, took it directly to his chief in the Pentagon.

This method, by which Admiral Denfeld acquired possession of the commission 3 months before the time it could become effective, was not the usual method for, and was not and did not purport to be, an official issuance of the commission to him.

Admiral Denfeld never at any time mentioned to me that he had a commission for his second term as Chief of Naval Operations in his possession. I knew that the commission had never been returned to the office of Secretary of the Navy and believed until January 18 that it was still at the White House unsigned by the President.

If I had known then what Rear Admiral Dennison and others have since told me, and what has been revealed on the floor of the Senate, I would, of course, have stated that the commission signed by the President and Secretary of the Navy had, without my knowledge, been put into the possession of Admiral Denfeld through an unusual procedure, that his possession of it has no legal significance, that he has never attempted to qualify for a second term as Chief of Naval Operations by taking the oath of office, and that, by reason of those facts and because he had been officially relieved of his duties as Chief of Naval Operations by direction of the President on November 1, 1949, he has not been Chief of Naval Operations since that date, which fact made the office vacant on November 2, 1949, when Admiral Sherman assumed the position.

From the foregoing it seems to me conclusive that Admiral Sherman, under his interim appointment by the President, has legally held the office of Chief of Naval Operations since he took the oath of office and otherwise qualified to assume the office on November 2, 1949.

Under the circumstances, if the Senate is satisfied with his fitness to serve as Chief of Naval Operations, in my judgment it would be proper that the President's appointment of Admiral Sherman as Chief of Naval Operations for a term of 4 years, now pending before the Senate, be confirmed.

Respectfully submitted.

FRANCIS P. MATTHEWS,
Secretary of the Navy.

The Honorable MILLARD E. TYDINGS,
The United States Senate.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator now yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; not until I finish reading the whole thing. I shall then yield. I want to cover all the points that were in dispute first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland declines to yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. So the Senate can follow it with more facility, the letter I am about to read is from the Secretary of the Navy to the President of the United States, recommending that Admiral Denfeld be relieved of his post as Chief of Naval Operations upon the conclusion of which I shall read the reply of the President. The letter is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, October 27, 1949.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: When I became Secretary of the Navy on May 25 of this year, I did so realizing that because of certain conditions then existing in the Department of the Navy and which we discussed at that time, the administration of the duties of Secretary would involve grave difficulties. Events which have since transpired have more than justified that apprehension.

You will remember that in our preliminary consideration of my appointment as Secretary, you emphasized that vital importance of the successful implementation of the Unification Act of 1947, as enacted by Congress. I then advised you of my unqualified approval of the policy of unification as embodied in that act and in the proposed amendments to the law which you had submitted to Congress. Furthermore, I pledged my best efforts as Secretary to assist the Navy to function in the utmost good faith as a full member in the unified defense team.

You carefully pointed out how essential it would be to have the proper military personnel in key positions, up to and including Chief of Naval Operations, in order to attain that much-desired result.

You also stated that you would cooperate that, as Secretary, I might be supported at all times by individuals of my own selection in positions of every important subordinate capacity.

Very soon after I assumed office, it became evident to me that there was definite resistance on the part of some naval officers to accepting unification of the armed services, notwithstanding the fact that it was established by law. That condition was reflected by public and private statements from various sources and by other methods. Some of the individuals involved in those procedures held very important assignments in the Navy.

For reasons which I feel adequate, I refrained from promptly bringing that situation to your official attention as Commander in Chief.

One of the first duties to confront me as Secretary was the selection of an appointee to succeed Admiral Denfeld as Chief of Naval Operations for the term beginning on the 15th of next December (December 1948). My final decision, after carefully considering various phases of the problems involved, was to recommend Admiral Denfeld for reappointment, and such a recommendation went forward to you through Secretary of Defense Johnson on August 2, 1949. One of the most persuasive of the considerations which led me to make this recommendation was the value to the Navy, and to the Department of Defense, which I expected to flow from continuity of service by Admiral Denfeld.

At that time, working with Admiral Denfeld whom I highly esteem, I had every reason to believe that we were in complete agreement on all important questions affecting the administration of the Department of the Navy. I felt sure that such a harmonious relationship would continue. Unfortunately, it soon became clear that my expectation would not be realized.

On Tuesday, the 4th of this month (October), events had taken such a course that, in a conference had with Admiral Denfeld early that day, I frankly stated to him that I feared his usefulness as Chief of Naval Operations had terminated. You may recall that I mentioned the possibility of Admiral Denfeld's replacement in the course of our discussion in your office when I was there in company with Secretary Johnson on October 5.

My relations as Secretary of the Navy with Admiral Denfeld as Chief of Naval Operations have finally become such that I find it increasingly difficult to work with him in the harmonious relationship which should prevail between the occupants of those two official positions.

A military establishment is not a political democracy. Integrity of command is indispensable at all times. There can be no twilight zone in the measure of loyalty to superiors and respect for authority existing between various official ranks. Inability to conform to such requirements for military stability would disqualify any of us for positions subordinate to the Commander in Chief.

The existence of the present situation prevailing between the highest civilian and the highest military officer of the Navy makes it utterly impossible for me, as Secretary of the Navy, to administer the Department of the Navy in the manner I believe vital to national security. Believing as I do in the vital importance of maintaining civilian control over the Military Establishment, a continuance of such a condition would be intolerable to me as Secretary of the Navy.

Reluctantly, therefore, but in accordance with what I believe to be for the good of the country, I respectfully request you as President and Commander in Chief to authorize the transfer of Admiral Denfeld to other important duties, and the selection of his successor as Chief of Naval Operations at the earliest convenient date.

Respectfully submitted.

FRANCIS P. MATTHEWS.

Upon receipt of that letter, the President wrote the Secretary, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, October 27, 1949.

Memorandum for: Secretary of the Navy.
From the President.

Over a long period of time I have devoted considerable thought to various aspects of the problem which you discuss in your letter of today's date.

The action which you recommend meets with my approval. Accordingly, I hereby authorize you to arrange for and carry out the transfer which you recommend.

HARRY TRUMAN.

Having read the letter from Secretary Matthews to the President, and having read the letter from the President to Secretary Matthews, I now desire to read a legal brief which I have requested be prepared concerning the authority for this action. I shall now read the brief to the Members of the Senate.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point to tell us who prepared the memorandum?

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall read it all. It will be signed at the end. It reads as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1950.

Memorandum for the Secretary of the Navy.
Subject: Status of the Office "Chief of Naval Operations."

1. You have requested my written opinion as to whether or not a vacancy exists in the Office of "Chief of Naval Operations." You will recall that I advised you orally in the premises at the time of Admiral Denfeld's removal on November 1, 1949. The opinion I gave you at that time was based on the authority hereinafter set forth.

2. Under the authority of the act of March 3, 1915, as amended, Admiral Denfeld was appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to be Chief of Naval Operations for a term of 2 years commencing December 15, 1947. He was duly sworn and in fact entered the office on that date. While he was so serving the pertinent portion of the act of March 3, 1915, was repealed and superseded by the act of March 5, 1948 (Public Law 432, 80th Cong.). Section 2 (a) of the act of March 5, 1948, reads in part as follows:

"There shall be a Chief of Naval Operations who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of not more than 4 years, from the officers of the active list of the line of the Navy who are eligible for the exercise of command at sea and not below the grade of rear admiral."

Section 2 (b) reads in part as follows:

"It shall be his duty to * * * be the principal naval advisor to the President and to the Secretary of the Navy on the conduct of the activities of the Naval Establishment."

I shall read that again:

"It shall be his duty to * * * be the principal naval advisor to the President and to the Secretary of the Navy on the conduct of the activities of the Naval Establishment."

Also pertinent to the duties of the Chief of Naval Operations is section 10, which reads:

"During the temporary absence of the Secretary of the Navy, the Under Secretary of the Navy, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Air; the Chief of Naval Operations, and the Vice Chief of Naval Operations in that order, shall be next in succession to act as the Secretary of the Navy."

This change in the law had no effect on Admiral Denfeld's incumbency of the office.

3. In August 1949 Admiral Denfeld was nominated and confirmed for a second 2-year term to commence on December 15, 1949. Subsequently, however, on November 1, 1949, he was relieved of his duties as Chief of Naval Operations by direction of the President. The question for determination in this case, therefore, is whether or not the President had the power to remove Admiral Denfeld from the office of Chief of Naval Operations prior to the expiration of the period for which he was appointed, and if so, how long the office continued vacant.

4. The case of Myers v. United States (272 U. S. 52) was that of a postmaster who had been appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of 4 years. The law then in effect provided that such postmasters should hold office for a period of 4 years but further provided that they could be removed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Myers was removed by the Postmaster General with the sanction of the President before the expiration of his term without reference to the Senate either directly, or through nomination of a successor during the 4-year period. Myers protested officially and then sued for his salary in the Court of Claims. The Supreme Court held in this case that the President is empowered by the Constitution to remove any executive officer appointed by him, whether or not the appointment was by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and that this power is not subject in its exercise to the assent of the Senate nor can it be made so by act of Congress. The Court explained its holding by the statement that "the reason for the principle is that those in charge of and responsible for administering functions of Government who select their executive subordinates need in meeting their responsibility to have the power to remove those whom they appoint."

5. Subsequently, in the case of Humphrey's Executor v. United States (295 U. S. 602), the Supreme Court held—that the President could not remove a Federal Trade Commissioner. The basis of the Court's opinion in that case was that in establishing the Federal Trade Commission and in providing for the terms of office of the Commissioners (their functions being "of legislative and judicial quality, rather than executive") and the conditions under which they could be removed, Congress was within its rights in restricting the President's power of removal (the Federal Trade Commission Act specified that a Commissioner could be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office, and the facts of the case were that none of those conditions was made the basis for the attempted removal). A reading of that opinion leaves no doubt of the distinction made between Government officials who are in purely executive or administrative offices and those who are required to perform judicial functions.

6. Another pertinent authority regarding the President's power of removal is to be found in the case of Morgan v. TVA—

That is another recent case—

(115 Fed. 2d 990, cert. den., 312 U. S. 701). In that case the President removed from office an individual who was a member and Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority. It was argued that the case fell within the decision of the Humphrey case—but the circuit court of appeals of the sixth circuit held that the duties of the TVA Board of Directors were predominantly executive or administrative in character, and that Morgan's removal was within the powers of the President. The case is therefore consistent with the holdings in the Myers and Humphrey cases.

7. The Chief of Naval Operations performs neither quasi-legislative nor quasi-judicial duties. He is strictly an executive officer. It is also pertinent to note that the office of Chief of Naval Operations involves the holding of an office in addition to occupying an officer's status as an officer of the Navy. He is an officer of the Navy Department and as such by law may succeed to the duties of the Secretary. See section 10 of Public Law 432, supra.

8. In addition to and wholly apart from the President's powers of removal as the Chief Executive, is his constitutional power as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces. The authority of a Commander in Chief to change the duty assignment of subordinate officers has not, so far as I know, been questioned, but by way of confirmation, the Attorney General of the United States has held that an act of Congress does not curtail the President's power as Commander in Chief to assign officers to any duty (28 Op. Atty. Gen. 270). I am therefore of the opinion that the President had what might be termed twofold authority to remove Admiral Denfeld from the Office of Chief of Naval Operations and that the orders of November 1, mentioned above, were legally sufficient to accomplish that removal.

9. Notwithstanding the foregoing, the question has been raised as to the effect, if any, of the President's nomination and subsequent confirmation by the Senate of Admiral Denfeld for a second term of 2 years to commence December 15, 1949. As previously stated, Admiral Denfeld was so nominated, and the Senate confirmed his nomination on August 15, 1949. About a month later a commission was made up and signed by both you and the President.

That is, the Secretary of the Navy and the President.

My information is to the effect that Admiral Denfeld has this commission in his possession, but that there was no authorized delivery of it to him, and no acceptance by him, and that he did not take the oath of office.

10. In my opinion those acts do not operate to reinvest Admiral Denfeld with the office from which he was removed. In this connection see 12 Opinion Attorney General 229, which states:

"Acceptance is necessary to vest the office in the appointee, and a formal acceptance is the evidence which in the public service generally it has been customary to require."

I state parenthetically that a man could refuse to make out a check to a collector of internal revenue who was not clothed with a commission and duly authorized to receive the payment.

See also 8 Comptroller Decision 521, 19 Opinion Attorney General 284, which state:

"Execution of the oath of office may be regarded as acceptance of the appointment."

It is obvious that when the President directed Admiral Denfeld's removal from the Office of Chief of Naval Operations early in November 1949, he did not intend Admiral Denfeld to become invested with the office for the second term, and it is equally obvious that Admiral Denfeld understood that. So far as I know, Admiral Denfeld has not asserted claim to it, and even if he had, the circumstances of Admiral Sherman's ad interim appointment and the expressed desires of the President would have prevented.

11. To summarize the foregoing, it is my opinion—

(a) That Admiral Denfeld was legally removed from the Office of Chief of Naval Operations on November 1, 1949.

(b) That he did not become reinvested with the Office of Chief of Naval Operations following his nomination and confirmation, or at any other time, notwithstanding the fact that a commission came into his possession.

(c) That a vacancy existed in the Office of Chief of Naval Operations when Admiral Sherman was given his ad interim appointment and continues to exist to the present time, subject to such ad interim appointment.

Very respectfully,

G. L. RUSSELL.

Before yielding to questions, the Senator from Maryland would like to state that in this discussion it has not been his purpose, and he hopes that indirectly no one can draw such a conclusion, that he wishes to cast any reflection, in any manner, shape, or form, on Admiral Denfeld, a man for whom he has an affection as well as a very high regard. I am simply, and as dispassionately as I can, doing what I promised to do, bring the facts to the attention of the Senate; first, to ascertain whether or not there was a vacancy in the Office of Chief of Naval Operations; second, to bring to the attention of the Senate in a chronological manner the various steps which led up to the removal of Admiral Denfeld, and the documents supporting his removal, and, third, to clear up the statement of the Secretary of the Navy that no commission had been issued to Admiral Denfeld, when the Senator from Wisconsin produced one on the floor of the Senate. I believe I have completely discharged the duties which I undertook, and fulfilled the promise which I made to the Senate in all of these categories.

Before yielding to the first question, it seems to me that the matter here is not whether Admiral Denfeld should have been removed or should not have been removed. There are those, no doubt, who feel that he should not have been removed. I know there are those in this body and those on my committee who have openly expressed themselves to the effect that he should have been removed, notwithstanding his high attainments as a naval officer, because of the incompatibility which developed between him and the Secretary of the Navy and the laws passed by the Congress in regard to certain phases of the matter.

Therefore, the question is not whether the President, rightfully, from the sense of right or wrong—if we put it on that basis—removed Admiral Denfeld, not whether he used bad judgment in removing Admiral Denfeld, not whether he was unfair in removing Admiral Denfeld, not whether he was unjust in removing Admiral Denfeld. The question is whether the President did have the right to remove him. If he had the right to do it, under the Constitution and under the law, whether he acted wisely or unwisely, rightly or wrongly, is for the conscience and the mentality of the President of the United States. If it is, as I believe and know it to be, within the scope and within the purview of the Constitution of the United States, then no man, Chief of Naval Operations or Member of this body, can say "Nay," if that is the President's constitutional prerogative.

Having made this statement, and again paying my respects to both Admiral Denfeld and Admiral Sherman as two great naval officers, and regretting this whole controversy, and wishing to bring the facts to the attention of the Senate, as I have done, I now take the witness stand for such cross-examination as the lawyers on the other side may care to make.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. I might first say that I believe I made it clear that if the time comes when the Senate is convinced there is a vacancy in the office of Chief of Naval Operations, I shall be very happy to vote for the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman. He is an outstanding naval officer, and he had a large part in winning the last war.

I should now like to ask the Senator a question. In view of the fact that the legal opinion upon which the Senator from Maryland is relying is based upon the facts set forth by Secretary Matthews; and if I can point out to him that again the Secretary is so careless with his facts that there is either deliberate untruth or an indication of gross incompetence on his part, will not the Senator agree with me that the legal opinion is worthless?

Mr. TYDINGS. Before answering the Senator's question, in view of the fact that he has used the expression "gross untruth"—I think it was—or "gross incompetence"——

Mr. McCARTHY. I said deliberate untruth or gross incompetence.

Mr. TYDINGS. In view of the fact that the able Senator from Wisconsin used those expressions last week on another occasion, and now that the facts presented here show that it was not deliberate untruth or gross incompetence, it would seem, in the interest of orderly procedure, that the Senator should first explain to this body where his charges are supported by any facts in his possession which prove in error the facts which I have read in the letter from the Secretary of the Navy. I do not think we ought to go on with these charges without clearing up the points seriatim as we proceed.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the Senator answer my question?

Mr. TYDINGS. Is the Senator going to take back the charge he made the other day?

Mr. McCARTHY. If he can show that I have been in error in any way, I shall be glad to correct my statement.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am sure the Senator will.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator has read to the Senate a legal document. I am sure that the Senator will agree with me that that legal document is worthless unless it is based upon an existent factual situation. In other words, if the man who wrote the legal opinion did not have the correct factual situation before him, the legal opinion is worthless. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. TYDINGS. I would not want to go to that extreme. I would not want to say that the legal opinion is worthless, because I think the legal opinion is eminently sound. I do not think the Senator can marshal one single case to the contrary. Therefore, I would not be willing to say that the legal opinion is worthless, because as a very humble member of the legal profession myself, it seems to me to be bottomed on extremely good constitutional law.

Even if I were approaching the matter without any examination at all, I know that the Constitution makes the President the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and as such I would assume that he could order around any officer he wanted in that entire military and naval establishment. I do not think there can be any question or any argument to the contrary. Therefore, even though this is a high office, the case is no different, in my book, than if the one involved were a second lieutenant, or a private, or a colonel, or a two-star general, or a 4-star general, or a 5-star general. No matter what the rank, the man who is President of the United States is his Commander in Chief. Therefore he had the right to take the action he took.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let me ask another question of the Senator. I think the Senator's answer is important in view of the position which he holds. Last week I came before the Senate and gave the Senate facts which the Members of the Senate previously did not possess.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes, and the Department gave the Senator facts which he did not have, which I read here today.

Mr. McCARTHY. I pointed out that Secretary Matthews told the members of the Armed Services Committee that no commission had been issued.

Mr. TYDINGS. And he was truthful in making that statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOUGLAS in the chair). Does the Senator wish to propound a question?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes. At that time I pointed out to the Senate that Mr. Matthews came before the Armed Services Committee and said no commission had been issued. He said, "I took the responsibility of advising the President not to sign the commission." When that was disclosed, some of the members of the Armed Services Committee present on the floor said, "These are not the facts as we understood them. We would like a further examination."

The Senator from Maryland, coming before the Senate today, reads a letter from the same man, Matthews. He also reads to us a legal document, an opinion, based upon facts set forth in the letter. I now ask the Senator this simple question: If I can convince the Senator that Matthews has again misinformed the Senator, then would he say that it is necessary for the Armed Services Committee to disregard the facts which Matthews has given the Senator from Maryland and hold a hearing and decide what the facts are, and will the Senator base his legal opinion on the facts as they actually are? That is a simple question, Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator asks me to answer a question which he has not yet seen fit to propound to me. He says if he does certain things. I should like to have the doing of the things precede his question, and then I can answer it. I cannot answer anything I do not know. I do not know what is in the Senator's mind.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let me ask the Senator this question: If I show to the Senator that Secretary Matthews has again misinformed him in the letter which the Senator has just read, then will the Senator think the Secretary is worthy of belief in anything he tells the Senator?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Wisconsin made the statement on Wednesday last that the Secretary had done several things which were wrong. The Senator said he had a copy of a commission, and that Admiral Denfeld actually held the commission. We investigated the matter, and found it was taken from the White House by Admiral Dennison, the President's naval aide, to Admiral Denfeld, and Denfeld puts it in his desk, when the normal procedure, as Denfeld knows, is to send it back to the Secretary of the Navy. I read the steps which should accompany the procedure. The Secretary of the Navy should give the commission to Admiral Denfeld on the day he is to take office. He is then to take the oath prescribed by law, receive all the papers, and enter upon the duties of the office.

The Senator from Wisconsin on Wednesday last led the Senator from Maryland to believe that Admiral Denfeld had come into possession of this commission in a perfectly normal and orthodox manner, that it was a fait accompli, that the whole proceeding was normal in every way, and that the Secretary of the Navy knew all about it. I find out on interrogation—I do not think Admiral Denfeld will deny it—that, so far as Admiral Denfeld knows, Secretary Matthews never had any knowledge that this commission had gone from the White House to Admiral Denfeld.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the Senator stop right there?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have before me a telegram from Admiral Denfeld. This is in answer to a telegram which I sent him. I telegraphed him and asked him to inform me how he came to have the commission. I asked him to tell me what the facts were which would indicate whether or not Matthews knew that he had been commissioned. I also asked him to send me the original of the commission. Here is the telegram:

In reply to your telegram. I received reappointment commission on or about 14 September. It was presented to me by the naval aide to the President, Admiral Dennison, in my office. Consider it a particular courtesy to me as CNO receiving it under those circumstances; otherwise would have received it by internal mail system in the Pentagon. The Secretary knew I had commission as I went into his office after its receipt and thanked him for it. At that time he stated nothing he had done since becoming Secretary of the Navy had given him greater pleasure than having me reappointed as CNO.

I knew that the Secretary was going to claim there was something unusual about the method of delivery. It then occurred to me that there may have been something unusual about this type of delivery. I thought I would endeavor to discover how other admirals received their commissions. So I took it upon myself to try and obtain that information. Now, the Senator knows, in view of the way heads fall when military or naval officers give us any information which the Secretary does not want us to have, it is rather difficult to secure that information. I had Admiral Leahy interviewed this morning. He was questioned as to how he got his commission. He said he got it directly from the President by mail. In this case it was delivered by the President's aide. Now, Mr. Matthews says that was an unauthorized procedure. Frankly I do not know.

The Secretary of the Navy, last week, after my discussion on the Senate floor, called the press in, or called some of the members of the press, and was going to give a statement in answer to this issue. Suddenly he changed his mind, after consultation with others in the Pentagon. I learned then that he was going to make the claim, which he made today; that is that there was no seal on this commission, and that, there being no seal, it was not validly issued.

I thank the Senator for the courtesy of giving me a copy of the letter when he started to read it. Let me read what the Secretary had to say. I think this is very important to the members of the Armed Services Committee and to the Senate, not because the question of Denfeld versus Sherman may be important, but in determining whether or not the Secretary of the Navy is competent to hold his job, whether any credence can be placed upon what he says, or whether the committee must secure its information from some other source.

Now, if the Senator will turn to page 5 of the letter which he has before him, this is what Mr. Matthews says. Here is the way a commission is normally handled. I am leaving out the first half of the page. Will the Senator turn to it?

Mr. TYDINGS. I know what it is. I could recite it by heart.

Mr. McCARTHY. I assume the Senator could.

When signed by the President, the commission is returned to the Office of the Secretary of the Navy, and then referred to the Bureau of Personnel where the seal of the Navy is placed on the document after it is signed by the President, as required by law.

The commission is then kept in the custody of the Secretary of the Navy.

Now turning over to the next page. First he tells about the way Dennison got it at the White House. He said:

Dennison then told me he took the commission directly to Admiral Denfeld's office.

Now turn to the next page.

I knew that the commission had never been returned to the Office of the Secretary of the Navy.

In other words, it never came back to the office for the seal. That is what the Secretary tells the Senator. He says it comes back to my office after the President signs it. Then the seal is placed upon it. He says in this case it was not done.

In my telegram I asked Admiral Denfeld for the original copy of this document. Admiral Denfeld says this:

The facilities of this small town prevent sending the commission through the mail in time.

He said in his telegram of last night:

Large photostatic copy clearly shows the seal in bottom center.

I had the Admiral called on the telephone and he said he did not think it proper for him to let his commission out of his hands except upon the request of the Armed Services Committee. He said if the Armed Services Committee were to subpena the document he would send it. I telegraphed him then and told him that because of the attitude which the chairman of the committee had taken—that is that he would conduct his own personal investigation and that he would not hold a hearing—undoubtedly there was no possibility of the Armed Services Committee seeing this document. I pointed out to him that looking at the large photostatic copy it was difficult clearly to make out the seal because the seal was an imprint.

I told him that a number of Senators had requested that the document be available to the Senate for their scrutiny. Admiral Denfeld then sent me this document. This is the document about which Secretary Matthews said that, first, he signed it, and then it went to the President; and he said that normally it would come back to the office of the Secretary of the Navy, and there the seal would be placed on it.

But in this case, so Secretary Matthews says, that was not done. On the contrary, it was taken to the President, and the President signed it; and then, without authority of the Navy Department, it was taken directly to Admiral Denfeld.

Does the Senator from Maryland care to look at the document?

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to look at both the telegram, which was the first thing I asked for, and then the document.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to have the Senator examine both of them. I do not know whether the Secretary of the Navy was deliberately lying or not.

I have undertaken to find out something about Secretary Matthews. I called some of my friends at Omaha, from which city the Secretary of the Navy hails. They tell me that he has a very good reputation.

I can only assume that Secretary Matthews is so incompetent that he does not know what goes on in the Navy Department. He said the commission did not come back to him; but we find that it did come back to him and he placed the seal on it. Admiral Denfeld says the next day he stopped at Secretary Matthews' office and thanked him for it. So we know that either Secretary Matthews is not telling the truth or else he is so incompetent that he does not know what is going on in the Navy Department. I think the latter is the case. Any man whose only qualification for the office is that he happened to support the winning presidential candidate, and who, as he says, never got any nearer to the water than once in a row boat, I say obviously does not know what is going on in his office in the Navy Department. I think it is clear that he is too incompetent for the job.

In view of the fact that Admiral Denfeld says he has received his commission for a second term as Chief of Naval Operations, and in view of the fact that the seal of the Navy Department and the signature of the President and the signature of the Secretary of the Navy appear on the commission, does the Senator from Maryland think we should confirm the nomination of Admiral Sherman to a position, which many of us have not decided is vacant?

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall be delighted to reply to the Senator's question.

First, let me refresh his memory as to why I am here today and why I have read the documents I have just read to the Senate.

The able Senator from Wisconsin on Wednesday of last week addressed himself to this subject, exhibited here on the floor of the Senate a commission, and made some remarks in regard to this entire matter.

When the Senator from Wisconsin had finished, the Senator from Maryland rose, and said that he had no knowledge of the alleged facts which the Senator from Wisconsin had presented, and that he did not wish to proceed in the dark. The Senator from Maryland promised the Senate that he would get a chronological account, from beginning to end, of what had happened, and also would get an able legal opinion as to whether there was a vacancy in the Office of Chief of Naval Operations. The Senator from Maryland said he was going to ask for those forthrightly; that he did not want any evasion; that he was going to let the chips fall where they may; that he wanted to learn exactly how this happened; and the Senator from Maryland promised that as soon as he obtained the facts and the opinion, he would lay them before the Senate.

Subsequent to that promise to the entire Senate, I received in my office this morning signed by five minority members of the Armed Services Committee—five eminent and able members—asking that we have an investigation of Admiral Denfeld's removal, and so forth.

In view of the fact that I had told the entire Senate, including the members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, that I would first try to ascertain all the facts, it looked to me like an attempt to jump the gun, to get an investigation under way before we found out whether there was enough of a vehicle to carry on an investigation.

Certainly in the interest of fair play and good sportsmanship, we should have found out whether, following the letter, there was still a desire for an investigation. We should not assume that all the statements made willy-nilly are statements of fact, when many of them are not statements of fact.

For instance, take the telegram which I now hold in my hand: Here is confirmation from Admiral Denfeld that the Secretary of the Navy told the truth.

What does Admiral Denfeld say in the telegram? He says:

> In reply to your telegram, I received reappointment commission on or about the 14 September, presented to me by naval aide to the President, Admiral Dennison, in my office.

Mr. McCARTHY. Is not that just as I read the telegram?

Mr. TYDINGS. Wait a moment, please; I have not finished.

Mr. McCARTHY. But is not that just as I read it?

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment; I was courteous to the Senator.

Yet the Senator from Wisconsin left in obscurity the entire phase of the matter as to how the commission got to Admiral Denfeld.

I did not think a commission could go to Admiral Denfeld unless it went through the Department of the Navy. If it went from the Department of the Navy to the President, and the President signed it, I would assume that it would go back to the Navy Department; and that was the supposition which Senators had made when they left the Chamber, following the discussion we had here last Wednesday, namely, that Admiral Denfeld had come into possession of this commission through normal channels, and that the Secretary of the Navy did not know anything about it.

However, the truth of the matter is that the commission went to Admiral Denfeld directly from the White House, a thoroughly improper way for it to go, for in the same telegram Admiral Denfeld says, as he has every right to say:

> Consider it a particular courtesy to me as CNO receiving it under those circumstances. Otherwise would have received it by internal mail system in Pentagon.

That is the way commissions are sent to officers generally, and to prove that, there is the Senator's own testimony that Admiral Leahy got his commission throughout the internal mail at the Pentagon.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is not correct, Mr. President; apparently the Senator from Maryland misunderstood what I said. I said Admiral Leahy got his commission from the President.

The Senator from Maryland has said that I left an erroneous impression. Will the Senator point out one word of the telegram which I did not read to the Senate?

Mr. TYDINGS. I said that the Senator from Wisconsin, in the remarks he made last week, left all of us under the impression that the commission had gone from the White House, in the normal way, back to the Navy Department, in the normal way that commissions are returned from the White House to the Navy Department, and had reached Admiral Denfeld in due course, and that the Secretary of the Navy knew nothing about it. How in the name of high heaven was the Secretary of the Navy to know it had come back, if it was taken directly from the White House to Admiral Denfeld and if Admiral Denfeld had it in his drawer?

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the Senator read the remainder of the telegram? If he will, he will know the answer.

Mr. TYDINGS. Admiral Denfeld had not even gone to the Navy Department to be sworn in.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland read the remainder of the telegram?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. BRIDGES. If the Senator will read the remainder of it, he will get the answer to his question.

Mr. TYDINGS. Admiral Denfeld says in the telegram:

> Secretary knew I had the commission, as I went into his office after its receipt and thanked him for it. At that time he stated nothing he had done since becoming Secretary of the Navy had given him greater pleasure than having me reappointed as CNO. Navy Department seal is on commission—

And some other things, which are personal, so I shall not read them.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Wait a moment, please.

Mr. President, what do we get from the remainder of the telegram? Let us read it again, so we shall have all of it in mind. The Admiral says that after he got the commission, he went into the Secretary's office and thanked him for it.

This is probably what took place: Admiral Denfeld said to Secretary Matthews, "I want to thank you, Mr. Secretary, for naming me again as the Chief of Naval Operations, for a second term."

Secretary Matthews probably replied, "Thank you, Admiral. It was a great pleasure to nominate you for the second term. It was one of the most pleasant acts since I have been here."

There was no exhibition of any commission; the conversation which occurred at that time was a perfectly normal conversation, having no connotation whatsoever with any knowledge on the part of the Secretary of the Navy that the commission was in the hands of Admiral Denfeld.

However, Mr. President, all this argument is entirely beside the point. Suppose Admiral Denfeld had taken the commission, the very day he received it, to the office of the Secretary of the Navy, and suppose the Navy's seal had been put on it. Suppose Admiral Denfeld had held up his right hand and been sworn in. All that would not make a bit of difference; the President could still remove him.

So what is all this sham battle about?

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes, I yield. I yield first to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. McCARTHY. There is one important thing before us which the Senator from Maryland seems to overlook.

Mr. TYDINGS. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not overlook some of the things he mentioned the other day.

Mr. McCARTHY. One of the matters before the Senate, which I think is of great importance, is the question of whether the Secretary of the Navy, when he appears before a congressional committee, correctly informs the committee, so that the facts on the basis of which the committee acts are the actual facts. There has been considerable weaseling in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy. In the letter he says that he knew not only that it was signed once, but twice. I do not find that point in the document at this moment, but it has been read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The Senator will recall that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] said to the Secretary in effect, "Do you take the responsibility for advising the President not to sign the commission?"

And the Secretary said in effect: "Yes, I take full responsibility"—or words to that effect.

Does the Senator from Maryland question it? I will find it, if there is any question.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is absolutely true, because the Secretary said in his statement here that he had no knowledge that the commission had ever come back from the President, and in the interim, he had written to the President asking for the removal, and the President had removed him. There is no proof that Secretary Matthews knew that Admiral Denfeld had the commission. There is no statement from Admiral Denfeld that he took the commission up and showed it to the Secretary.

It looks to me like a sham battle. What difference would it make? The President could have removed him, if he had taken 10 oaths, signed 75 commissions, put 415 seals on it, and if he had held office for 15 years and 6 months.

Mr. McCARTHY. I may say I personally think the President could have removed him. As of this date, I do not know whether the President has done so or not. Mr. Matthews originally said the reason for the vacancy which occurred was because the commission was never issued. He says, today, the reason for the vacancy having occurred is because the President had removed the man. I do not know which of the statements by Matthews I can rely on.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have the orders here.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let me finish my question. Reverting to the Senator's statement that Matthews had no way of knowing that the commission was issued, if he will turn to page 5 of Matthews' letter, Matthews says, first, "The commission would be signed by me. Then it goes to the President. Then it comes back to me, and I put my seal on it." On page 7 he says this was never done—that is, that it was never transmitted from the President to the Secretary of the Navy. However, we have before us a document with the seal affixed, showing that it did come back to Matthews. We know he placed his seal upon it, and then the President, using the same system that was used when Leahy received his commission, as a courtesy, had it delivered to Denfeld. So the Senator cannot conceivably say that Matthews did not know that it came back.

Mr. TYDINGS. With all due respect to the able Senator from Wisconsin, who is my friend, we are discussing a man who holds a very high office, and it seems to me we are trying vainly, in the face of the very well-reasoned and explicit letter which I have just read, to dwell on small points. The truth of the matter is that Admiral Denfeld could not legally have entered upon his term of office without taking the oath, anyway. It is the law that one must take the oath at the time he assumes the office.

I do not know the facts, neither does the Senator, and perhaps they have been lost in the obscurity of time, because so many events happen to all of us, it is pretty hard for any of us to tell what we were doing a month, 2 months, 3 months, or 6 months ago. But I am speculating on this. I do not have any facts to support it, but what I think happened was this: I think Admiral Dennison was of course under the Chief of Naval Operations. He was an aide at the White House. He looked up to his chief, as every Navy man has a right to do, and he thought how nice it would be to go over and tell the Admiral that the President had just signed his commission. The reason they had two commissions, I am advised, was that the first one was the ordinary printed type of commission, and, as it was a great office, and came as the culmination of a long and distinguished career on the part of Admiral Denfeld, they wanted to give him a commission that he could keep as a memento and hand down. Consequently, the commission was prepared, signed by Mr. Matthews, and signed by the President. After that had been done, Admiral Dennison wraps it up and goes over to his chief, feeling great loyalty to the man who headed his branch of the armed services, and he says, "Admiral, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to bring your commission to you." Admiral Denfeld probably said, "Thank you. It was nice of you to attend to it so quickly." He opened it and read it. They both had a pleasant little talk, and he put it in his desk. He then said, "I ought to go up and thank the Secretary for this commission." So he went up to the Secretary's office and said, "Mr. Secretary, I cannot tell you how much I appreciate your confidence in me." The Secretary then probably turned around and said, "It was one of the finest things I could do, to recommend you for this place." It seems to me that what we are trying to do here is to find a man dishonest, deliberately, who has made a perfectly rational statement. I hope I shall never be that small.

Mr. McCARTHY and Mr. KNOWLAND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin. But nothing the Senator has said shows that the office had been filled. The law still stands. The office is vacant, and we have a nominee on the calendar.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield. It looks to me as if this whole colloquy is over a pretty small peanut, if I may use the word.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let us see whether it is. I think it is not small peanuts to determine whether the Secretary of the Navy comes to the Capitol and misinforms a committee. I should like to know why the Secretary makes certain statements. I cannot find the spot in the letter, but the Senator can, I am sure. Secretary Matthews says: "I was not testifying to facts. I was testifying to the legal import of facts." Is not that what the letter says?

Mr. TYDINGS. The letter was that the removal and replacement of Admiral Denfeld are supported both by the facts and the law. That is what he said.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator will find it in the Secretary's letter. He says, in substance: "I was telling the Senate what I thought the fact was." Here it is:

> Therefore, when I stated today that a commission of appointment had never been issued to Admiral Denfeld, we all understood that to mean no official commission.

Let us see whether that is what he said the day he testified. On page 95 he said the commission was never issued to him. Today he said: "I mean it was never legally issued." Further along on the page he said: "He never issued the commission"—meaning the President. On page 99, after he had testified that the commission was never issued, he was questioned further. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] said:

> Well, this certainly is different from anything I have ever heard before.

Matthews said:

> Do not ask me as a lawyer, now.

He said:

> You have got to get a legal opinion on that, yourself.

So Matthews was before the committee. At that time he was not saying, "What I am giving you is my own legal interpretation of what has happened." He said, "These are the facts." He said:

> These are the facts as they happened. You have to get a legal opinion on that, yourself.

Today, he comes and says, "I knew the facts to be different, of course, but I am a great lawyer; therefore I say the office is vacant."

Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether he will agree with me now, that in view of the fact that it has been definitely established that the Secretary of the Navy gave us erroneous facts in regard to the issuance of the commission, regardless of whether this determines whether there is a vacancy today or not; in view of the fact that the Secretary twice has given us erroneous information, first before the committee, then again later, after he had had much time to think the matter over and refresh his memory, and when he again comes before us and says, "This commission never got back to my office for a seal; it does not have a seal upon it"; does not the Senator now think we should get all the facts from a competent source before we are called upon to pass on the nomination?

Mr. TYDINGS. Has the Senator finished?

Mr. McCARTHY. I, for one, and I assume many other Senators, are put in a very unusual situation. If the Senator calls up the nomination at this time, we shall then have before us the nomination of Admiral Forrest P. Sherman, an outstanding naval officer. We shall not know whether there is a vacancy or not. We shall know, if the facts as Matthews has given them to the Judge Advocate General are true, that then perhaps there is a vacancy; but we shall know those facts come from a man who is notoriously inaccurate. Therefore we shall either have to vote to confirm a man to a job that is already filled, or may be filled, or vote against a very competent naval officer. I may say that if the Senator calls up the nomination without taking the matter back to the Armed Services Committee and giving us the benefit of that commitee's study, I, for one, can do nothing except answer "present" when the vote is taken. I can neither vote against the nomination of Admiral Sherman nor for it.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to make a very brief statement and then ask the Senator a question. Personally I am very sorry that Mr. Matthews did not ask to come before our committee very promptly when there was a misunderstanding as to what he had previously said before the committee. I think it would have been very helpful if he had come before the committee, instead of asking the chairman to read a statement in his behalf on the floor of the Senate. I say that, because his testimony was given to the committee, and he should have answered the committee. He has done differently.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to correct him? I know he does not want to misstate the case.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should be glad to have the Senator correct me if I am in error.

Mr. TYDINGS. There was never any question about any of these matters, so far as the Senator from Maryland knew, until the question was raised on the floor of the Senate last week by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Maryland then was asked what his attitude would be in certain hypothetical cases. The Senator from Maryland said he would like to investigate the alleged new facts which were brought out, and promised the Senate he would do that and lay the matter before the Senate. There was no request for rehearing before the committee. That only reached my office this morning, and, whether it had come or not, the Senator from Maryland would have been honor-bound to carry out his promise to the Senate. I do not want the Senator to think that Mr. Matthews was delinquent, because at the time the charges were made Mr. Matthews was in Omaha, Nebr., and did not return as I understand until the end of the week some time, and therefore, of course, he had no opportunity.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I thank the Senator. It seems to me there are two questions presented. The first is the question whether Admiral Sherman is a proper man and should be confirmed. The Navy has not had a head now, except an interim head, for some months. The Navy is a very important branch of our armed services. The Chief of Naval Operations has certain functions to perform. It is difficult for him to perform them unless he is confirmed. That is one question.

The other question involves the veracity or the misinformation of the Secretary of the Navy. I personally have a high regard for the veracity of the Secretary of the Navy. I do not know him well personally, at all, but I believe, from what I ascertained about him, that he is an honest man and intends to b an honest man. That is another question entirely. On that question, it seems to me that if any Member of the Senate or of the committee itself should like to question Mr. Matthews further, it would be helpful to have him come before the committee. As Secretary of the Navy he must come before the committee at some time or other and open himself to questions on any subject about which any Member may want to ask him.

I point out to the Senator from Maryland, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, that as I have listened to the arguments today it has occurred to me that the commission was delivered to Admiral Denfeld in September. Whether it was issued to him by proper authority, as pointed out by the Secretary at that time, does not seem to me to be material, because he was removed from that office on November 1, or was relieved of his command at that time. If the commission is a good commission, issued by proper authority, in every proper way, he was relieved on November 1, an interim appointment was made, which was accepted. If this commission was legally issued by authority, the Admiral would have to take the oath when he received the commission. He has never taken the oath. Therefore the office unquestionably is vacant today, in my humble judgment. We have, as I say, the responsibility to fill that office in order properly to protect the security of the United States.

I hope we shall proceed promptly to confirm the nomination of Admiral Sherman, and then, if I may put it in the form of a question, would the Senator from Maryland be willing to hold a hearing and have Secretary Matthews come before it, opening the meeting to any questions which the members of the committee or any invited Members of the Senate would like to ask him at that time?

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for all he has said. I think the Senator and I are in more or less substantial agreement. Let me say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I do not believe it is fair to the Navy, to the country, or to Admiral Sherman, there being a vacancy in the Navy Department as to which he himself has testified, to hold off confirmation of his nomination while we have an investigation into some collateral matter having nothing at all to do with the vacancy and having nothing to do with the fitness of Admiral Sherman. The Senator from Maryland has been careful, in answering questions, to try to keep before the Senate the Sherman nomination and the fact that there is a vacancy, if the nomination has been legally made, quite apart from any investigation.

I now come frankly to the second proposition raised by the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Maryland is only the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. That committee meets regularly every Thursday morning at 10:30. Whenever any member of the committee desires that an investigation be made regarding anything under the sun, all he has to do is to make a motion to that effect, have it seconded, and the question is put to the committee and the committee decides whether an investigation should be held. Does the Senator from Massachusetts think it would be becoming for the Senator from Maryland to prejudge what the committee will do, and say, "I shall go ahead and do it anyway?" I think, whatever my faults may be, the Senator from Massachusetts, who has served for a long time on the Armed Services Committee and is one of the ablest and best members of that committee, will accord me at least the small compliment of saying that I have never been a dictator on the committee and have never done anything without the committee's approval. Is that correct?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. That is correct. I believe the Senator from Maryland is an honorable man. Will the Senator join with me and other Senators in inviting Mr. Matthews to come before the committee?

Mr. TYDINGS. For what purpose?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. For any purpose.

Mr. TYDINGS. No. I do not believe in inviting persons to come before the committee for any purpose. I want to know what I am undertaking. I do not believe in taking a blunderbuss and shooting in all directions at the same time. If there is a proper request for an investigation into a matter which affects the security and welfare of the Nation, we should consider it; but I do not think we should call the Secretary of the Navy before us and go into a blind investigation. It should be an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining this, that, and the other thing. If that is done, perhaps I shall go along. But, so far, I have not seen that kind of a proposition advanced, and I do not believe we should start calling Cabinet officers before a committee and having an investigation which has no limitation. If that sort of an investigation should be held, all they could do would be to spend the time from now until next election day, which is in November, and after that they would not be called at all.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Will the Senator join with the Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators in inviting the Secretary to come before the committee and give an account of his problems?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have already stated to the members of the committee that so soon as we can get two or three of these matters out of the way we shall call the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary for Air, and the chiefs of the Army, Navy, and Air Force, who wear the uniform, to appear before us for a review. I have already made arrangements, about some of which the Senator knows, to have the Committee on Armed Services briefed at the Pentagon Building. So, if we can get time to devote to national defense, rather than going off on tangents, we can all be pretty well informed. But if we are going to try to investigate every little quirk of human nature, we shall never extend the efficiency or the composition of the three branches of our Defense Establishment.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. At the time the Secretary comes before the committee, it is the privilege, opportunity, and right of any member of the committee to interrogate him; is it not?

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course it is, as to anything which seems pertinent to our national defense. I do not want to dignify what I believe is a comedy of errors. Everyone has testified in good faith. Certainly the statement of the Secretary is perfectly reasonable and plausible, and is, I believe, an honest and factual one. I do not want to dignify some different idea which someone else entertains as requiring a full-scale investigation by the Armed Services Committee. We might call the Secretary before us and he might say, "What are you going to investigate?" We would have to say, "We do not know." He has been referred to as being either incompetent or a liar. He was examined for 2 hours a few days ago, and at that time he was asked pertinent questions and he supplemented his testimony.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. First of all, Mr. President, I think the record should be kept straight. The Secretary of the Navy, perhaps inadvertently, in answering questions put to him by members of the Armed Services Committee, gave testimony which was not in keeping with the facts. That may have been inadvertent. I am willing to allow the Secretary the benefit of the doubt on that question. But the fact is that the testimony before the committee shows that in reply to a question I had asked him, he said:

> Well, at the present time the vacancy occurs by the fact that Admiral Denfeld's first term has expired, and he never has been appointed for a second term. His name was suggested. He was confirmed, but the commission was never issued to him.

That stands as the uncontroverted testimony of the Secretary of the Navy before a standing committee of this body, and it was not until the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY] produced on the floor of the Senate additional facts that any other members of the committee had any knowledge that there was any controversy as to the testimony of the Secretary of the Navy.

In the second place, the Senator from California had pursued the questioning, going into the matter of whether there was a vacancy, and he began to inquire in the Denfeld matter. Here is what the Secretary of the Navy said at that time:

Secretary MATTHEWS. I did not say that the change of my opinion was due to the hearing; no, sir. I want to say this to the committee, if I may, that if you want to go into the questions of my reasons for my changed opinion in regard to Admiral Denfeld, there are two requests I have to make. I would want some time to go back and look over my records and refresh my recollection on dates you mention, and then I would ask with all deference to Admiral Denfeld that it be a closed meeting.

Senator KNOWLAND. I am personally willing to drop my line of questioning at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that may be done.

Secretary MATTHEWS. I am perfectly willing to give you my innermost motives and everything that may have prompted what I did, but I want to do it properly.

Senator KNOWLAND. I think it is a perfectly reasonable request, and I am willing, at this stage of the proceedings, provided the Secretary says he would be glad to come before us at any time. That satisfies me at that particular point, and I shall be glad to pursue it at some other time.

Mr. President, I think there is a very clear obligation on the part of the Secretary of the Navy to come before the Armed Services Committee of this body and make his explanations in person for the testimony which may have been inadvertently incorrect. I think the basic issue here goes far beyond this particular job. I raise no question as to the right of the President of the United States to remove a chief of naval operations. I clearly recognize that he has that right under the Constitution of the United States. He is the Commander in Chief. I believe that of necessity, by virtue of his office and by virtue of his responsibility, he must have that power. That to me is not in issue. It may be in issue, as the Senator from Wisconsin pointed out, not questioning whether the President has the power, but questioning whether or not he has exercised the power which he otherwise would have.

I believe there is a far more important question before the Senate, and one which should concern the Members of the majority, as well as the Members of the minority on this side of the aisle, because the membership on the two sides changes from time to time, and we who are in the minority today may be in the majority a year from today or 3 years from today. The basic question is, when all Members of the minority on the committee who are in town unanimously sign a letter to the chairman of the committee, asking that the Secretary of the Navy come before the committee and correct misinformation which he gave to the committee, are they to be denied that right? I say to the Senators who sit on the other side of the aisle that in my opinion a very dangerous precedent would be established if the attempt were made to gag us, if the attempt were made to withhold from us that which has customarily been the power of a legislative committee.

The Congress of the United States also has its constitutional obligations. We cannot perform our constitutional obligations if we do not have access to the information upon which to base our sound judgment. I cannot believe that, on sober reflection, Members of the majority or the chairman of the committee would wish to deny to the minority, because we today happen to be in the minority, a right which has always been extended to committees, to make proper inquiry into matters which come before them and which are pertinent.

I make this plea not only to the majority members of the Armed Services Committee, but, indeed, I make it to all the Members of the Senate, because I think it is a very basic issue, going to the very constitutional responsibility of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. CAPEHART obtained the floor.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me before he yields the floor?

Mr. CAPEHART. I shall be very happy to yield to the Senator, provided I do not yield the floor by yielding.

Mr. McCARTHY. I should like to have unanimous consent that I may ask the Senator from California one question without the Senator from Indiana losing the floor.

Mr. CAPEHART. I ask unanimous consent that I do not lose the floor by yielding to the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCARTHY. I should like to ask the Senator a question which I believe to be of tremendous importance. In view of the fact that we are confronted with a legal question of such a nature that the chairman of the committee felt called upon to get a detailed opinion from the Judge Advocate General's office; in view of the fact that this involves not only Admiral Denfeld, but involves the President's right to remove a statutory officer; in view of the fact that as of now I do not know whether delivery of the document, the Commission, for example, was a legal delivery—in view of the fact that we do not know whether Matthews is right or wrong, and in view of the further fact that if the President can remove Admiral Denfeld by merely saying, "You are fired," then, the question is, Can the President circumvent the entire purpose of that part of the Unification Act under which we set up the Joint Chiefs of Staff? In other words, if he can remove Admiral Denfeld with a scratch of the pen, then he can also remove General Bradley tomorrow, and, if he wishes, he does not have to appoint a new man. I am inclined to believe that he can remove the officers in that fashion, and that is unfortunate, in my opinion. I believe the President has the right to remove Admiral Denfeld, and I am rather inclined to think that the office is vacant, if the new facts which Matthews gives us are correct.

I urge that the members of the Armed Services Committee meet tomorrow, or at the earliest possible moment, and go over the facts, and then give the Senate their legal opinion as to whether or not there is a vacancy. There are some very able lawyers on that committee, who have a very competent legal staff to assist them, and if the committee will do what I have suggested, when we vote on the confirmation of Admiral Sherman there will not be any question. I wonder if in fairness to the entire Senate and the country, the Armed Services Committee should not perform that simple function.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I am utterly amazed that the Secretary of the Navy himself does not immediately call the chairman of the committee and say to him, "Senator TYDINGS, since I inadvertently made a statement before your committee which turned out not to be the fact, and I did it in testifying before your committee, I think it is due me to afford me an immediate opportunity to come before your committee and correct that record." I think that that is a fair thing to do. I think it is a fair thing for the Secretary of the Navy, and for the committee. I believe, looking over the long-term relationship between the Secretary and the committee, in the middle of a Presidential term, that if the Secretary is properly advised he will ask that that be done immediately. I cannot believe that the Secretary should wish to stand behind any technicality, having given testimony which was not accurate before the committee, in giving an answer with the members of the committee not in a position to examine him on it.

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. For what purpose?

Mr. GURNEY. For a short observation on a subject which has been discussed for 2 hours. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Indiana may not lose the floor if he yields to me.

Mr. CAPEHART. Under the circumstances, I shall be very happy to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GURNEY. I hope that the chairman of the Armed Services Committee will not let his decision stand, to the effect that every time there is a request for the calling of a witness by a member of the committee or a group of members of the committee, he will require a committee vote to decide the question of whether or not such witness shall be called. I have not been a Member of the Senate so long as has the Senator from Maryland. Nevertheless, my experience on the committees on which I have been a member has always been along the line that whenever a member asked for a witness, or asked for information, every facility of the committee was put to work to bring the information or the witness to the committee at as early a date as possible. I believe that the records of the Armed Services Committee will show that that has been the custom of that committee. My memory tells me that that appears in the records.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GURNEY. I do not have the floor with permission to yield to the Senator from Maryland. If I am allowed to finish my statement, I shall be very happy to yield, with the permission of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator has asked what I will do.

Mr. GURNEY. No. I am making a statement. It is my hope that the Senator from Maryland will not adhere to his statement that he will require a committee vote. That is my hope. Certainly if we could have had the right to bring such witnesses as five members of the committee indicated in the letter which was transmitted to the Senator from Maryland on Friday afternoon, and which I previously had told the Senator was coming, it would have given the committee an opportunity to join with the Senator in presenting the proper information to the Senate. That was my purpose in signing the letter requesting the Secretary to come before the committee in executive session. I desired to make that statement a matter of record on the floor of the Senate.

I therefore hope that the Senator from Maryland will not consider the request as taken care of by this 2-hour debate on the floor of the Senate this afternoon. I join with the Senator from Massachusetts expressing the hope that we can quickly confirm Admiral Sherman's nomination to be Chief of Naval Operations. But I think we owe it to the Secretary of the Navy to ask the final question which any member of the committee may have in his mind, or which any Member of the Senate may have in his mind and may wish to transmit to the members of the Armed Services Committee.

I hope, therefore, that the Senator from Maryland, as chairman of the committee, will reconsider the statement which he has made.

Mr. TYDINGS. I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to proceed for 3 minutes, and that at the conclusion of my remarks the Senator from Indiana shall not lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I ask unanimous consent that the able Senator from Maryland be given a minute and a half and that the able Senator from Washington be given a minute and a half, without my losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. TYDINGS. These charges against the Secretary of the Navy were not made in the Armed Services Committee. They were made upon the floor of the United States Senate, before all the people of America, and they were printed in the newspapers of America, and here is where the Secretary ought to file his answer. If the Senator from Wisconsin, instead of making the charges, had written the Secretary a letter and said, "Certain information has come to my attention which seems to be contrary to the testimony you gave," and had gotten the Secretary's answer before he smeared him all over the country, there would have been that degree of good faith which ought more or less to characterize the operations of democratic institutions.

The Senator from Maryland is due tomorrow morning to attend a meeting of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and I believe that what will go on there will be of more importance than the question whether the commission was in the first or second or third drawer of Admiral Denfeld's desk. Furthermore, the Committee on Armed Services will meet on Thursday. As I have said repeatedly, all the men I have mentioned, will be called before that committee in due course. But if the Senate wants to take it up in an abnormal way, the Committee on Armed Services can certainly do so next Thursday.

I do not want any investigation because I believe the Secretary has told the truth. I can see nothing to it—and I say this with no reflection on the Senator from Wisconsin—but the pursuit of littleness in trying to twist the Secretary's words so as in some way to make him appear to be either non compos mentis or a consummate liar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Maryland has expired.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, as the newest member of the Armed Services Committee I want fully to associate myself with the views as recently expressed by the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND].

As an individual Member of the Senate I am prepared, sir, to vote for the confirmation of Admiral Sherman's nomination this afternoon, or at any other time. I think him an outstanding naval officer, and the Navy Department needs him.

But I have a great hope, sir, that the Armed Services Committee will find it convenient and proper to clarify the contradictions which have been submitted for the record by some of us as Senators and by the distinguished Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Matthews. Mr. Matthews, to be precise, has said on more occasions than one that he knew nothing about the existence of a commission. We have now placed Admiral Denfeld in the position of sending a telegram over his signature to the Senator from Wisconsin in which Admiral Denfeld said, "Mr. Matthews knew all about this." I think it nothing short of simple common sense and decency to call before the Armed Services Committee both gentlemen whose great names have been brought into question before this body, so that we may determine what the facts are, render judgment on the matter, and go on to other public business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is Senate Joint Resolution 25, the so-called equal-rights amendment.

The Chair recognizes once again the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART].

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. The business before the Senate is the so-called equal-rights amendment, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; Senate Joint Resolution 25.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask the present occupant of the chair if it has come to his attention that it is proposed to bring the matter of the nomination of Admiral Sherman before the Senate for action this afternoon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not informed respecting that matter.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield in order that I may propound a question to the distinguished Senator from Maryland, without the Senator from Indiana losing the floor thereby?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield for the purpose stated, providing I do not lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr President, I should like to propound the following question to the Senator from Maryland: What are his intentions relative to the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman? I have not been present all the time the matter has been under discussion, and I wondered whether the Senator from Maryland asked for action to be taken today.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to ask this afternoon for unanimous consent to consider the nomination of Admiral Sherman. However, if any Member in the meantime conveys to me the information that he will oppose a motion that the Senate go into executive session and proceed to consider the nomination, I have no desire to prolong the argument; but I should like to say—and I hope the Chair will be indulgent with me—a few words more.

The Navy has had some pretty unfortunate happenings. Unfortunate happenings come to all of us. They come to the Army, to the Air Force, to us as individuals, to parties, to countries. The Navy has had an unfortunate investigation which has hurt its prestige, and which, I think, ought to have been handled in an entirely different manner. I say that without any reflection upon anybody. There has been the dispute over Admiral Denfeld. The largest battleship in the Navy is now aground. There is a certain amount of demoralization in this great arm which has covered itself with luster and written many brilliant pages in American history. I at least hope we can confirm the nomination of an able officer and, regardless of the other matter, let him function as the head of the Department, get the Department going, and build up its morale in the face of the situation which now confronts it.

THE CONVICTION OF ALGER HISS

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, a jury of loyal Americans in a district court in New York last Saturday reached a verdict of guilt that we shall find goes far beyond its effect on the lone defendant. That defendant was Alger Hiss. The jury found Hiss guilty on two perjury counts, thus, in effect, finding him guilty of being an espionage agent for a Communist spy ring.

It also, in effect, found him guilty of taking copies of secret documents from the Department of State for use by the Communists.

But, Mr. President, that same verdict stretched a veil of guilt across the souls of others. The others may not have been guilty of espionage, or even of perjury, but they are definitely guilty of laxity, negligence, and disloyalty.

Let us examine the effect of that verdict, Mr. President. Let us see why a verdict of guilt against one man should be so expansive in its effect.

Just who was Alger Hiss? He was not an ordinary clerk in Government service. Alger Hiss was recognized in every position he held as an important person.

Alger Hiss is 45 years old. He is a graduate of Johns Hopkins and Harvard Universities. He was a former secretary to the late Supreme Court Justice, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr.

His first entrance into Government service was in 1933, when he joined the Department of Agriculture and served under Henry Wallace, who was then Secretary of the Department. It was while he was serving under Wallace in the Agriculture Department that Hiss became associated with the Communists. That, Mr. President, was 17 years ago.

Then, in 1936, Mr. Hiss transferred to the State Department and later was loaned to the Nye Committee as a counsel.

The accusations that he had stolen copies of State Department documents, confirmed by his conviction last Saturday, went back to that period—some 14 years ago.

But let us proceed for the moment with a recital of the positions Hiss held in the Government. Later, in the State Department Hiss headed the Department's Office of Special Political Affairs from 1944 to 1946.

He had acted as consultant and assistant to the late President Roosevelt during the conferences in Tehran and Yalta. And we will talk more about that later.

He was Secretary General of the San Francisco United Nations Conference—a position of tremendous importance.

Hiss has boasted that he drew the working draft for the United Nations. And he was the conference Secretary General when the Charter for the United Nations was written and approved.

Since 1946 Hiss has been president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Mr. President, this man Hiss, now facing a prison term as a Russian Communist espionage agent, was an important man in our Government. It has been proved, Mr. President, that he had the support of other important people in the Government.

Let us, Mr. President, recount the steps that Hiss took that have finally led to his conviction.

I have pointed out how he began in the Department of Agriculture under the secretaryship of the man who ran for President in 1948 under a left-wing banner, and how Hiss moved from the Agriculture Department to the State Department where he began filching documents for the Communists.

Is it not rather significant, Mr. President, that it was in 1935 that Hiss first met Whittaker Chambers, a self-confessed Communist and an espionage agent for the Reds?

The testimony shows that Hiss agreed to obtain State Department secret documents for Chambers and the Communists as soon as he entered the State Department.

Mr. President, I think it is fair to raise this question: Could it have been an agreement with the Russian Communists that led to Hiss' interest in shifting from the Agriculture Department to the State Department where documents of more importance to Communists are kept?

However, Hiss had high endorsement for the new position.

From that time until 1938, when Chambers left the Communist Party, Hiss delivered State Department documents to Chambers who in turn gave them to Col. Boris Bykob, a Russian spy agent. Those documents consisted of copies of top secret confidential dispatches and cablegrams. But, more important, is the fact that those documents had been decoded before they were delivered, thus revealing to the Russians in 1938 what was then our top-secret code known as the Gray Code.

That, Mr. President, was prior to the period of the friendly pact between Germany and Russia, which existed from August of 1939 to September 1, 1941. At the very time the Russians were on friendly terms with Hitler, they had the secret of our code. Speaking literally, men have been shot for being less traitorous to their country. That very act might well have cost the lives of millions of American boys had the war taken a different turn—had Hitler kept his word with Stalin.

I want to remind my colleagues that this extremely serious offense took place 10 years ago. Could it have been detected by proper authorities in our Government at that time? Or perhaps, I might even ask: Was this actually detected by authorities in our Government before the evidence was laid before the court of justice in New York in the second trial of Hiss? I ask that question as I proceed to outline the additional steps that were taken in the strange case of Mr. Hiss—steps which now, for the first time, are known to the American people as confirmed facts.

Three days after that German-Russian pact was signed in August of 1939, Whittaker Chambers came to Washington to tell his story of Hiss to the late President Roosevelt. Chambers had been out of the Communist Party for about a year and a half at that time. It was common knowledge among leading newspapermen in Washington that Adolf A. Berle, Assistant Secretary of State at the time, was Mr. Roosevelt's principal intelligence man. So it was not surprising that Marvin McIntyre, then Secretary to President Roosevelt, referred Mr. Chambers to Mr. Berle.

It is now a matter of evidence in the court record that Chambers named 30 workers in the Government, including Alger Hiss and his brother, Donald, as Communists, when he told the story of Communist espionage to Mr. Berle.

Mr. Berle revealed many notes about what Chambers told him in 1938, as he testified before the House Un-American Activities Committee during the investigation of the Hiss matter in 1948.

This is a good time, Mr. President, to identify further Donald Hiss. He is now a member of the law firm from which Mr. Dean Acheson resigned to take over the position of Secretary of State, a position which he holds today.

From the time when Mr. Chambers told his story to Mr. Berle until the House Un-American Activities Committee first touched on the story 2 years ago, the top espionage in the modern history of America rested as a secret in the souls of a few persons. Mr. Berle testified before the House committee that he had taken up the matter of the Chambers story with Mr. Acheson. But nothing was done about the evidence. In fact, Mr. President, it was not long after that that Mr. Hiss received a promotion in rank. His secret of espionage activities buried, Mr. Hiss, through his endorsements and support by persons of importance in our Government, moved on into positions of great influence.

Oh, yes; rumors were floating around for a time that Mr. Berle, as Mr. Roosevelt's top intelligence man, had spoken to the late President about the Chambers-Hiss story, but that the late President shunted the issue aside with the comment that anyone carrying such a foolish tale should jump into the Potomac with it. Then there was the opinion, voiced by some, that Mr. Berle was forced out of the State Department by the Hiss-Acheson combine. Nevertheless, Mr. Berle kept the notes until 1943, when they were placed in the State Department files, and were never made public until the second Hiss trial. They were barred from the evidence of the first trial.

Two years after those notes were placed in State Department vaults, Mr. Hiss accompanied the late President Roosevelt to the Yalta Conference as a chief adviser. He had also gone to the Tehran Conference with the late President, but the importance of Hiss at the Yalta Conference is striking. It was at the Yalta Conference that the great powers were to agree on a postwar peace program. Mr. Hiss had his plans drafted by this time. Stalin demanded 16 votes for Russia's so-called republics. A bitter dispute raged. Some 30 representatives of the powers left the Conference. Stalin remained with a Russian interpreter. President Roosevelt remained. And Alger Hiss remained.

Outside that conference room, Mr. President, waited the then Secretary of State Stettinius; Admiral Leahy, Chief of Staff to the President; Harry Hopkins, Special Assistant to the President; and Justice James Byrnes, then Director of the Office of War Mobilization. When Mr. Roosevelt and Alger Hiss came out of that room, they advised those waiting outside that an agreement had been reached to give Russia three votes. Keep in mind that the United States has only one vote.

How many other agreements were reached behind closed doors in Yalta and Tehran and other places are just now coming to light in the form of a threatened third world war within a generation.

What part did Mr. Hiss play in this agreement? There is no answer, but when Mr. Roosevelt came out that door and heard the protests of his other advisers against such an agreement, he said:

> I know, I shouldn't have done it. But I was so tired when they got hold of me. Besides, it won't make much difference.

Two months later, Mr. President, Mr. Roosevelt died.

Whom did he mean when he said "they got hold of me?" Could he have meant Mr. Stalin and his interpreter? There was only one other man in the room besides Mr. Roosevelt. That was Alger Hiss.

It seems quite significant that Mr. Berle, in testifying before the House Un-American Activities Committee, should say—just a few years later—that Hiss and Acheson were leaders of a group which took the pro-Russian point of view.

Hiss said in his testimony before the House Committee that he opposed the three-vote phase of the agreement, but endorsed the agreement on the whole. He said:

> I still think it was a very valuable agreement for the United States.

That is an interesting commentary, since it was at Yalta that the final agreement was reached in the betrayal of Poland. Other infamous deals were completed at that conference, too, I might add.

But, through the persistence of the House Un-American Activities Committee, the Hiss story began to unfold on August 3, 1948, when Whittaker Chambers first brought to light his story of espionage. Attempts were made by many influential members of our Government to belittle the story, to mislead the people, to continue to cover up for Hiss, just as they had when FBI inquiries about Hiss from 1945 to 1948 failed to bring to light that which later brought conviction.

Mr. President, we are all quite familiar with the denial by Hiss that he even knew Chambers, and then his admission that he had known him as George Crosley.

We are familiar, too, with the failure of the Attorney General, or any others in the Justice Department who handled criminal prosecutions, to take any action in what the committee reported to be pure perjury.

I shall refer again, Mr. President, to this particular period in the Hiss case, but now I wish to continue to brief the steps that led to conviction.

It was on August 15 of that year—1948—that the Justice Department announced that they would drop investigation of possible perjury charges. Two days later, Mr. Chambers, who faced a $75,000 libel suit filed by Hiss, laid on the conference table in Baltimore, where the libel attorneys were studying evidence to be presented in the case, the copies of State Department secret documents given to him by Hiss. The Justice Department then stepped back into the case and impounded the papers.

Then came the House committee's move to obtain more evidence. It subpenaed Chambers, and his testimony led committee investigators to the pumpkin on Chambers' farm near Westminster, Md., where were hidden microfilms of other secret documents. Some of those had been furnished by Harry Dexter White, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, who died suddenly just 3 days after being questioned by the House committee.

At that point, Mr. President, the Federal Bureau of Investigation stepped in with its full might into a case that was 10 years old. A tribute is due the FBI for its success in uncovering witnesses and evidence, although its agents were forced to follow trails that had long before grown cold.

Then, as we all recall, came the first trial of Hiss on two counts of perjury, on which he was indicted December 15, 1946.

We recall, too, the wide criticism of the judge in that case, Samuel H. Kaufman, a novice jurist hearing his first important case.

The indecision of the jury followed.

It might be well to add that quite a number of persons of importance in the Government here in Washington expressed, before that decision, opinions to the effect that Hiss would not be convicted. Those expressions gained significance as Judge Kaufman continued in the trial to bar testimony by certain Government witnesses—witnesses whose testimony was not barred by Judge Henry W. Goddard, a veteran of 26 years on the bench, in the second trial.

That, Mr. President, is a brief outline of the steps that led to the conviction of Mr. Hiss last Saturday in New York.

But, that is not all the story. That is not all the story of the secret conspiracy to protect Hiss.

On February 28, 1947, in the year after he had been told by Prime Minister Attlee of Great Britain and Prime Minister MacKenzie King, of Canada, that the Canadian Communist atomic spy operations spread to the United States, Mr. Truman belittled the activities of Communists in this country.

Mr. Truman was told by Attlee and MacKenzie aboard the Presidential yacht on the Potomac that the investigation of the Canadian spy ring had disclosed serious American angles.

Yet, on February 28, 1947, Mr. Truman wrote the following passage in a letter he sent to George Earle, former Governor of Pennsylvania:

> People are very much wrought up about the Communist "bugaboo," but I am of the opinion that the country is perfectly safe as far as communism is concerned—we have too many sane people.

Then, on September 28, 1948, President Truman defied the facts of the Hiss case which had been developed by the House committee.

Less than 3 months before Hiss was to be indicted and sent on his way to conviction as a spy, Mr. Truman said these words in Oklahoma City, Okla.:

> Our Government is not endangered by Communist infiltration. It has preserved its integrity and it will continue to preserve its integrity as long as I'm President.

I would say, Mr. President, that in one breath Mr. Truman was right. The Nation had preserved its integrity—far more so than he had accepted his responsibility as President of the United States. I shall prove that point even more in just one moment.

Only a few moments ago I charged that certain persons of influence in this Government attempted to mislead the people and to misrepresent the Hiss case.

One of those persons was President Truman.

On August 5, 1948, just 2 days after Whittaker Chambers had unfolded his story of the Hiss espionage acts before the House Un-American Activities Commitee, President Truman made his now infamous remark at a press conference in answer to questions about Communist activities in the Government.

He said the Hiss story was being used "simply as a red herring."

Mr. President, at the very moment Mr. Truman made that remark, his officials either had in their possession, or could have obtained the very evidence that convicted Alger Hiss as a spy in New York last Saturday.

Now, I want to carry this charge against Mr. Truman even further.

On September 2, 1948, again some 3 months before Mr. Hiss was indicted on evidence that has been in possession of influential officials of the Government for nearly 10 years, Mr. Truman issued this quote at his press conference:

> It's just a plain lie out of whole cloth. I never defended a disloyal person in my life.

This statement was made in reply to a charge that Mr. Truman was protecting Communists within the Federal Government.

In all this time just preceding the House committee disclosures of the Hiss case and his ultimate indictment and conviction, President Truman has denied congressional committees access to the loyalty files on Federal officials.

But, there is still more. Early in 1949, we all recall, Mr. Dean Acheson was nominated by Mr. Truman for Secretary of State. This is the same Mr. Acheson, of course, who had figured in the Chambers testimony in the Hiss case.

So, it was quite natural for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, during a routine discussion with the new appointee, to ask about Mr. Acheson's associations with Mr. Hiss.

Mr. Truman's Secretary of State to be promptly replied that he was a friend of Hiss and would remain his friend. Mr. Hiss had been indicted a few weeks before.

And I should like to add another influential person to this list of those who knew of Hiss's activities for many years. He is Justice Felix Frankfurter. Justice Frankfurter boasted that he sponsored Mr. Hiss in his quest for Government experience. Their associations within the Government were, according to the testimony, quite close.

Then, in the first Hiss trial, Justice Frankfurter volunteered to be a character witness for Hiss. Judge Kaufman, in the presence of the jury, felt inclined to stand and shake well the hand of the character witness from the high Court. Judge Kaufman also saw fit to smile approvingly at Justice Frankfurter's testimony on behalf of Hiss. Another Justice, Stanley Reed, required a subpena before he would appear.

These Justices sit on the highest Court in the land—the United States Supreme Court. It is possible the Hiss case may find its final hearing before this Court.

One of these men, Justice Frankfurter, either knew that evidence existed in the State Department against Hiss, or he could have known.

At this point I wish to read into the RECORD an editorial from today's Washington Daily News, as follows:

HISS CASE LESSONS

The conviction of Alger Hiss should cause some soul-searching in the White House and the State Department.

This man was found guilty of perjury—of trying to lie himself out of charges that he betrayed his country and its Government, under which he held positions of responsibility and trust.

Yet it has taken 11 years for justice to triumph over political pressures.

The prosecutor who won the case before a Federal court jury sometimes must have wondered which side the Government was on.

President Truman called the congressional investigation which brought to light the charges against Alger Hiss a red herring.

Two justices of the United States Supreme Court testified as character witnesses for Hiss at his first trial last year.

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt sought through her newspaper column to create public sympathy for Hiss and discredit his accuser.

Ambassador-at-Large Philip C. Jessup testified in behalf of Hiss at both trials.

Secretary of State Acheson publicly expressed confidence in Hiss as recently as January 1949, although by that time most of the evidence which has resulted in the conviction was known.

Nor was that Mr. Acheson's first introduction to the Hiss case. When existence of a spy ring in the State Department was reported to the Government in 1939, an investigating official was told that Dean Acheson and Justice Felix Frankfurter would vouch for the Hiss boys. (Donald Hiss, brother of Alger, is a member of the Acheson law firm.)

It is admirable for a man to stand by a friend in trouble. But is it pertinent to ask where Secretary Acheson now stands?

For it would be assuming too much to conclude that Alger Hiss was the only person in the State Department or elsewhere in Government service who transmitted official secrets to agents of Soviet Russia.

It would be assuming perilously too much to conclude that the State Department and other Government agencies are now free of traitorous enemies within.

Imprisonment of Alger Hiss will do little to protect this country unless there is drastic change in the attitude of high officials who sought to belittle the charges against him and to help him escape punishment.

Mr. President, behind all these facts—facts which convicted Hiss—lie many more links in a secret conspiracy to deceive and mislead. President Truman is in position to reveal those missing links of conspiracy. If the American people are to have faith in their President and his statements, he should now come forth and apologize to them for making the misleading and misrepresenting statement of "red herring" on the dangers of communism in this Government as revealed by congressional committee investigations. I also demand that he reveal the identity of those who have conspired to protect Hiss so the American public will be fully advised as to just who these people are—and if any of them are still being employed by the Government, they should be kicked out immediately.

Then, Mr. President, I call upon President Truman to ask Secretary of State Dean Acheson to resign in the face of undisputed evidence that he was told of the charges against Hiss and had in his Department the Chambers accusations originally given to Mr. Berle in 1939.

Finally, I feel that Mr. Truman should ask Justice Frankfurter to resign his position, in all decency to the high Court of which he is a member.

This should be prompted by his sponsorship of a convicted spy and because of his close association with Hiss during the period in which Hiss participated in espionage work.

And, in the end, Mr. President, I recommend that the leaders of this great Nation dispense with the practice of placing political gain above their obligation to protect America against its enemies. Neither political party is exempt from this responsibility.

When we ignore—and even protect—our enemies, then America is lost.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. KEFAUVER obtained the floor.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield in order that I may, acting as minority leader, ask the majority leader a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Tennessee may yield for that purpose.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois what the plan of procedure is, after the Senator from Tennessee has concluded what he intends to say.

Mr. LUCAS. May I inquire of the Senator from Tennessee how long he expects to speak upon his amendment?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Approximately 25 or 30 minutes.

Mr. LUCAS. There are a number of speeches to be made, as I understand, with reference to the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has just returned to the Senate floor, and I should like to advise him that the Senator from Tennessee now has the floor and has advised me that he will take approximately 30 minutes to discuss a substitute amendment for Senate Joint Resolution 25. I understand other Senators intend to speak upon the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman, and it was the thought of the Senator from Massachusetts and myself that in view of the fact that we might be here for a couple of hours, we might take a recess until tomorrow, in executive session, and that immediately upon meeting tomorrow we could proceed to the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM] has told me that he desired to discuss the question. The arrangement as outlined by the majority leader and by the acting minority leader is satisfactory. I only wish to inquire whether the Senator from Missouri will be prepared to proceed with his remarks tomorrow.

Mr. KEM. I shall be prepared. I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield further?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to say to the Senator from Maryland that, in addition to the Senator from Missouri, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY] will have further remarks, as will possible other Senators. If we recess until 12 o'clock tomorrow, it is agreeable to them, as I understand, to speak on the subject before the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman is voted upon tomorrow.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee further yield in order that I may make one further comment on the situation?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. We shall proceed tomorrow with the debate on the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman, regardless of how long it shall take, until we get a vote by the Senate. Then we shall resume the unfinished business. I understand there will be only a few speeches to be made before we shall be in position to request a vote.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wonder if it would be feasible to set a time now, giving ample opportunity to every Senator to speak sometime tomorrow afternoon, when it might be possible to have the matter come to a vote. I would suggest 4 o'clock. That would give 4 hours.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I do not have the authority to make any agreement at this time without a quorum call, but I believe that what the Senator suggests will come to pass.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, from what I know about the situation, I believe we can finish before 4 o'clock.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield for one further question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Does the majority leader expect to take up any other business this evening, after the Senator from Tennessee shall have concluded his speech?

Mr. LUCAS. There will be no further business on the floor of the Senate this afternoon after the Senator from Tennessee has concluded. We shall then take a recess, as in executive session, until tomorrow at 12 o'clock noon.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 25) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the bill which I wish to offer at this time is Senate bill 1430. I shall move to strike out the resolving clause of the so-called equal rights amendment, and the text of that amendment, and to insert in lieu thereof the text of Senate bill 1430, with two short amendments which are included in the motion which is on the President's desk.

In the substitute which I have mentioned, Senate bill 1430, I have been joined, as sponsors, by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON].

The substitute is not merely a measure in opposition to the so-called civil rights amendment, because it has very substantial backing by many organizations of women who are interested in the political, social, and economic welfare of women. I have here a list of 37 organizations which have expressed opposition to the equal rights amendment but which have joined in the sponsorship of the women's status bill which is known as Senate bill 1430.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the list of these organizations be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL COMMITTEE ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN IN THE UNITED STATES

The following organizations oppose the equal-rights amendment:

American Association of Social Workers; American Civil Liberties Union; Americans for Democratic Action; Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America; American Federation of Hosiery Workers; American Federation of Labor; American Federation of Teachers; American Federation of Women's Auxiliaries of Labor; Brotherhood of Boilermarkers, Iron Ship Builders and Helpers Union; Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen; Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen; Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express, and Station Employees; Congress of Women's Auxiliaries of the CIO; Congress of Industrial Organizations; Communications Workers of America; Glass Bottle Blowers Association of the United States and Canada; International Ladies Garment Workers Union; International Womens Auxiliary of United Automobile Workers; Machinists Union; National Consumers League; National Council of Catholic Women; National Council of Jewish Women; National Council of Negro Women; National Farmers Union; National Federation of Post Office Clerks; National Federation of Settlements, Inc.; National League of Women Voters; National Womens Trade-Union League; Textile Workers Union of America; Oil Workers Union of America; United Automobile, Aircraft, Agricultural Implement Workers of America; United Hatters, Cap, and Millinery Workers; United Packinghouse Workers of America; United Steel Workers of America; Womens National Homeopathic Medical Fraternity; Women's Society for Christian Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church (eastern division); Young Women's Christian Associations of the United States of America (National Board).

Mr. KEFAUVER. The general position of the various organizations is very well expressed in a resolution which was adopted at the Sixteenth National Conference on Labor Legislation in Washington, D. C., on December 1, 1949. The National Conference on Labor Legislation is a conference attended by the commissioners of labor of the various States, together with representatives of various labor organizations. The resolution is as follows:

RESOLUTION PASSED AT SIXTEENTH NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON LABOR LEGISLATION, WASHINGTON, D. C., DECEMBER 1, 1949

Resolution VII—Women's status bill

Whereas it is highly desirable to hasten removal of any remaining discriminations against women in the law, as well as any discriminatory policies and practices that may operate against them in the administration of Federal and State law; and

Whereas it is essential to preserve provisions of labor legislation which have proved beneficial to working women over long periods of their experience, and other provisions of law safeguarding the interests of wives, widows, and mothers; and

Whereas the women's status bill of 1949, pending in the Eighty-first Congress (S. 1340, H. R. 2396), would establish a policy for the United States of nondiscrimination on the basis of sex, both in provisions of law and in their administration, while at the same time safeguarding legislation of benefit to women, and further would establish a commission to investigate and report on current discriminations against women in law and practice: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Sixteenth National Conference on Labor Legislation affirm its support of the women's status bill, and urge favorable consideration and action thereon by the Eighty-first Congress.

Mr. President, in connection with our substitute for the equal-rights amendment, some confusion has grown up as to what changes women want in this field of so-called equal rights. Let me say that I think it would be difficult to find any American woman today who would be against equality for women. What has not been made clear is what in fact would provide equality for the great majority of American women. Historically, equality or equal rights for women had certain meanings; today, the term has quite different meanings. A hundred years ago equal rights meant that women did not want to be excluded from the franchise and wanted control of their property.

Women now have these rights. Our equal-status substitute takes advantage of the experience women have gained in handling the franchise, in handling property, and in active pursuit of educational and economic interests. Experience has indicated the difficulty of applying the early formulation of equality as identity of treatment with men in all situations. Take, for example, one of the simplest situations, as an illustration—age of majority as between boys and girls. Is identity of treatment here the same as equality? I submit it is not, if physiologists are correct in telling us that girls on the average mature earlier. Probably no great harm would be done if identity of treatment were required in this particular matter. But there are other fields in which enlightened public opinion today is calling for, and is fast achieving, the enactment of laws which treat men and women differently as a matter of principle, and where identity of treatment would be detrimental to women.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I shall be very happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. In studying the various States laws, does the Senator find that they deal differently in regard to the treatment of children? Is it not correct that in some States the husband is required to support the children?

Mr. KEFAUVER. In the hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Senate Joint Resolution 61 on September 28, 1945, beginning at page 59 of the report of the hearings, are listed the laws which give special privileges and protection to women and to female children in the various States, and any member of the Senate who wishes to see the provisions for necessary protection in the interest of society, and for the benefit of women which have been enacted by the legislature of any particular State can find them in report of the hearings. Certainly it would be very difficult to believe that anyone who is really interested in the welfare of women in his particular State would wish to repeal or to nullify the effectiveness of all these special laws which have been passed for the benefit of women.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. What would happen to the protection which is accorded to children under the various State laws if this proposed constitutional amendment were ratified?

Mr. KEFAUVER. As to female children, the special protections which are now provided for them under State laws, for example, against rape or sexual offenses, and even under the Federal white-slave statute, as I understand it, would be nullified under this amendment.

Mr. President, I refer to provisions of certain State laws which require that in divorce proceedings a judge prefers the mother as guardian of the minor children of the couple, other things being equal. These are merely some of the special laws which have been passed for the welfare and benefit of women, and to which reference was made by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON].

These illustrations point up the practical problems women face. From their experience they have secured permanently an increasing realization that they gain most by working out each situation as it comes along, that they risk disappointment if they accept any predetermined formula until it is apparent that it also meets the practical realities of their day-by-day needs, and therefore they want no barrier in the way of specific adaptations that seem desirable in their progress. It is this specific, fact-by-fact approach to equality which characterizes my proposals, submitted as Senate bill 1430, on the status of women, and which gives them practical value.

Women's organizations very generally support these proposals, and they demonstrate the lines along which intelligent progress can be sought. Because these revisions deal with specific situations, they are all manageable projects. By that I mean that they can each be considered in relation to particular, known areas of fact and experience, and their effects can be prejudged with sufficient accuracy for reasonable people to make reasonable decisions. This specific, situation-by-situation approach is characteristic of legislation in the United States, and permits us to make our judgments with confidence that we know what we are doing and what we can expect from our actions.

My substitute, S. 1430, declares that it is the policy of the Federal Government to abolish distinctions based on sex in Federal law and its administration, except such as are reasonably justified by differences in physical structure or maternal function. This language is designed to avoid the principal defect of the equal-rights amendment which would eliminate all distinctions in legal treatment of men and women, even where their fundamental reasonableness and common sense is apparent. The new proposal adopts a legislative, rather than a constitutional, method of attack upon unfair discriminations which persist in our laws. It reaches discriminations which are not presently outlawed under the fifth and fourteenth amendments of the United States Constitution or by State constitutions, and which would not be outlawed under the so-called equal-rights amendment.

The bill requires the agencies of the Federal Government to review their regulations and practices in the light of the new declaration of policy and, so far as existing law permits, to revise or modify them accordingly. Each agency is obliged to report its action to a Presidential commission, established by the bill.

This commission would have the duty of studying and reporting on all phases of the legal, economic, and social status of women in the United States today. It would review and evaluate all the significant differences in the legal treatment of the sexes in this country, and determine which are discriminatory, in the light of the declared policy. It would report its conclusions and recommendations to the President. The President, in turn, would transmit the report to Congress with his recommendations for further legislative or other action.

Another major provision of the bill is a recommendation that the several States declare a policy similar to that of the Congress of the United States, and review their own laws and practices with a view to revision and change. The report of the commission would serve as a factual basis for the revision of State codes, and as an economic and social brief for action.

The issue is not whether women should be given equality with men—in that, I am sure, we are all agreed. The problem arises in making that equality effective, in achieving an equality which takes account of the differences between men and women, in physique and function, and also the different situations in which women find themselves today because of historical limitations and restrictions. In some fields, such as the right to vote, we are quite clear that no distinctions should be made. In others, such as provisions for family support and the legal age of maturity, the need for distinctions is clear. Between these is a wide area in which opinions and practices vary. My substitute proposes to declare a general policy as to equality for men and women and then provide for an orderly review of the status of women through which we can determine what changes would actually achieve equality, rather than to impose identity under a masculine pattern.

I should now like to discuss the substitute in some detail. Of first importance is the policy statement in section 1 of the substitute. This reads that "no distinctions on the basis of sex shall be made except such as are reasonably justified by differences in physical structure, or by maternal function." This is careful language. The key words in this statement, as I read it, are "reasonably justified." Differences between the sexes are reflected in many of our laws. The test is whether established legal distinctions are reasonably related to these differences. The substitute focuses attention directly on the distinctions which discriminate against women, discriminations which shock our sense of justice, and which we should seek to eliminate.

The policy statement defines the basis for judgment as to what are reasonable distinctions, namely, "differences in physical structure, or in maternal function." It is hardly necessary to go into detail as to the existence of such fundamental differences. It is generally accepted, for example, that the special responsibilities women carry in bearing and rearing children require recognition in law. The policy recognizes the reasonableness of certain types of legislation based on the fact that women bear children, and that it is to the public interest that this function be protected. Similarly, it is generally recognized that prolonged standing subjects a woman's body to strain, and for this reason many States require employers to provide seats for their women workers. Lead poisoning is considered especially dangerous to women during pregnancy, and some States place restrictions around women in lead industries. However, the policy demands that legal distinctions based on these sex differences must be reasonable. To be reasonable a distinction must be based on more than custom or prejudice, and relate directly to the maternal and family functions women fulfill.

The policy I have just discussed is proposed as "the declared policy of the United States in law and its administration." I should like to emphasize the importance of this proposal in relation to administration. Discriminations against women can creep into administrative practices in ways quite unforseen in an original statute. The substitute, in section 4, recognizes this possibility and directs all Federal agencies and departments at once to conform to the declared policy of the substitute and to modify or eliminate rules, regulations, and practices in conflict with such policy, except as prevented by existing law. Agencies are further required to report on a given date the extent of sex distinctions remaining in their rules, regulations, or practices, with the justification therefore. Such procedure provides an immediate remedy, without further legislation, for discriminations that are now practiced against women through regulations.

The creation of the fact-finding commission is one of the outstanding features of this substitute. It is generally recognized that most of the statutes which deny full legal status and recognition to women were enacted many generations ago, in response to social needs and cultural patterns which differed widely from today. Their revision has not kept pace with social and economic changes. Some of these laws which treat the sexes differently may still embody what we regard as socially desirable provisions. Others are antiquated and should be repealed. The separation of those still useful from those antiquated or actually harmful is a selective process which can only be engaged in conscientiously on the basis of the factual considerations underlying each law. What this substitute really proposes is a fundamental review and revision of Federal and State codes to assure that laws which treat men and women differently are neither unreasonable nor inequitable to either sex.

Some may be under the impression that the facts on which informed legislative action should be based are already known; that therefore no Commission study is necessary. Unfortunately, this is not the case. Review of the Congressional hearings on the Equal Rights amendment reveals little consideration as to whether specific laws, treating men and women differently, are good or bad. Although lists of such laws have been maintained by the supporters of the amendments and the Women's Bureau, no expert and authoritative study has ever been made to evaluate them in regard to their reasonableness and social utility. The Commission established by the substitute will be equipped to make findings of facts and informed judgments which will furnish the basis for well-considered legislative action.

The organizaiton of the Commission appears to be highly appropriate to its purpose. It will be composed of 15 members appointed by the President, not more than three of whom shall be employees or officers of the executive branch of the Government. This makes possible representation from different areas of interest and experience. It would be my hope that the President would find it possible to appoint both men and women on this Commission, and that these persons should represent various points of view. Sections 2 and 3, which describe the Commission, carry also enabling clauses as to staff, including the authority to cooperate with Federal, State and private agencies and to utilize their facilities without compensation. The long experience of cooperation between Government agencies and women's organizations should make work on this project fruitful, particularly in stimulating interest in State and local civic groups affiliated with the national women's organizations. On the basis of the information this Commission gathers, it is required to report to the President, with recommendations, and the President is required to forward these to Congress within 30 days together with his own recommendations. At this point the life of the Commission terminates, and further action will be the responsibility of the Congress and of the State legislatures. The value of this substitute is therefore to provide a basis for sound action; and aside from the fact that it declares a policy and requires administrative adherence to it, it does not in itself constitute final legislation.

While the Commission report will be helpful to the Congress, to State legislatures, and to other officials, its value will be equally great as a basis for informed public judgment. It will help us all to understand the fundamental problems and the role of legislation in dealing with them. The facts and the experience that can be brought together by the Commission will go far to clarify these issues, some of which are complex, and open the way for women and men to decide together what they want to do with the old and the new in our experience. This substitute strikes me as a good way to get at the specifics in this question, and to determine how revisions in our legal codes can result in a constructive formulation of women's status in modern society.

Even if the equal-rights amendment is passed by Congress, it would probably suffer the same fate as the child-labor amendment. The required three-quarters of the States will not ratify it when they realize that the Nation-wide rule of uniformity it imposes will not only disrupt laws and customs which have become well established and accepted in their States but will also deny to their legislatures any opportunity, now or in the future, to accommodate their laws to local conditions and experience which make distinctions drawn on sex lines wise and desirable for men and women alike.

Amending the Federal Constitution is not necessary. Contrary to the views of some women attorneys who support the amendment, women are clearly "persons" in the constitutional sense, protected from arbitrary and capricious classification by the fifth and fourteenth amendments.

Even if the amendment is ratified, it will not be self-executing. State legislatures will find it necessary to revise their laws to make them conform with the amendment. Thus, in view of the length of time required for State ratification and subsequent code revision, passage of the amendment by Congress would actually hinder and delay rather than hasten the legislative review necessary in any event.

Mr. President, very briefly I think it is important that we consider some of the laws the women of the United States and the people of the United States are going to find automatically repealed if the amendment should become effective. Let me say, in this connection, that all organizations that have as their members women who actually work, are not, I believe, in favor of the so-called equal-rights amendment. Such organizations have fought a long, long time for protective laws for the benefit of women, and they do not want to see them brushed off the statute books in one stroke. The Secretary of Labor, the head of the Women's Division of the Department of Labor, the former Secretary of Labor, Mrs. Perkins, and all the officials of the Labor Department who have expressed themselves, have said that the adoption of the amendment would be injurious to the welfare of women and the welfare of society. It would be destructive of the laws which have been passed for the benefit of women. It would be a step backward. But they do urge the passage of Senate bill 1430 which would declare a policy of equality, except where the distinction is based on the difference between men and women.

First let us consider the family relationship. I assume it to be correct, as was stated by the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH], that you cannot have your cake and eat it too. You cannot have certain rights unless you are going to assume certain duties and responsibilities. The distinguished Senator from Maine said that was exactly the reason she was in favor of the equal-rights amendment—because she wanted the women to have exactly the same duties and responsibilities that men have.

Mr. President, let us first consider the family relationship. The English common law has always recognized that the man of the family has the primary responsibility for the support and maintenance of the family and the children. Laws passed by any State—and I believe all States have laws to this effect—would be automatically repealed by the adoption of the so-called equal-rights amendment. It would repeal the common-law duty of a man to have the superior duty of supporting his family. The so-called equal-rights amendment would make the man and woman equally responsible, or it would make neither.

How about the marriageable age?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the equal-rights amendment were adopted would it be possible for the husband to sue the wife on the ground that she was not adequately supporting him?

Mr. KEFAUVER. It would be possible, yes. The laws placing a prior responsibility on the husband would automatically be abolished.

Mr. DOUGLAS. And children could demand that their mothers go to work to support them?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is one of the responsibilities that would go with the equal-rights amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Senator from Illinois has made a very pertinent point.

Let us consider the Army, the Navy, and other armed forces. If the amendment means what the Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] said it means, that if women are to have equal rights with men, they must have equal duties; if it means that no laws can be passed that distinguish man from woman, then when we carry on our selective service we shall be obliged to draft into the armed forces women just as we now draft men. That might be all right, although it would give us a few more women in the armed forces than men, because I think the female portion of the population is a little greater than the male. That might be all right if all the women were put in the WAVES or the WACS or the SPARS, and did not have to be placed on front-line duty. But according to this proposed constitutional amendment, no distinction could be made as to whether they would have to carry a rifle or operate a typewriter, or whether they would have to march with a 60-pound pack; no distinction of any kind, because of sex, could be made in respect to the service they would render, once they were in the armed services.

Mr. President, I wonder whether the women of America really want that. What kind of armed establishment will we have if we cannot say that the men will do the actual front-line fighting, while the women serve in the offices or in similar places?

Mr. CAIN rose.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Does the Senator from Washington wish to ask a question?

Mr. CAIN. I was curious about the trend of the Senator's present thinking. I wonder whether perhaps he might agree with me, in a military sense, that if and when we have another war, it will be imperatively necessary to find the job which any given individual is best qualified to fill, without relationship or reference to sex. I should like to say to my friend the Senator from Tennessee that I am reminded of the fact that in the last war the Russians appeared to me to have had a far better comprehension and understanding of what total war really meant than all the other nations put together, including Japan and Germany. It was my own impression—perhaps I was wrong—that the Russians let every person qualify for what he or she could do best, to the end that if a woman could become a good sniper because her eyesight was keener, sniper she became, to the end that the Russians promptly set about killing more Germans.

I was struck by the contradiction, because it seemed to me that the Senator was presuming that we would not keep pace with progress in things military, in the future.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I say to the distinguished Senator from Washington that if he would offer an amendment to that effect—namely, that this proposed constitutional amendment shall not apply to the armed establishments—I think it would be very helpful.

I certainly agree with the distinguished Senator from Washington that we should be able to use women where they will do the best jobs in the services, and we should be able to use men where they will do the best jobs. But certainly under the wording of this proposed constitutional amendment, if an equal duty and responsibility go with an equal right—and I think almost any lawyer will argue that if there is a right, it is necessary to assume an equal responsibility—then I do not see how, on the basis of sex, we can keep women out of the front ranks of the infantry or out of the machine gun corps, because the proposed constitutional amendment would provide that—

Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of sex.

That means that we cannot make any rules or regulations to the effect that A will be in one place—perhaps in an office—and B will be in the front lines of the infantry, and make any such differentiation because of sex. Of course, we might separate them, and might say that A is not quite so strong as B, so A will be in the office and B will be in the front lines; or we might make a distinction as between the service they would render because of ability to fly an airplane, or something of that sort. But under the proposed amendment, if it becomes a part of the Constitution, certainly we could not make any distinction so far as sex is concerned.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, to permit me to ask a question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. I wonder whether the Senator is suggesting that the women of tomorrow should not be in the front lines in the war of tomorrow.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I did not suggest that to the Senator at all. I said there were very many useful places where the women of today or the women of tomorrow can be used in a war. But in case a married man with children is drafted into the armed services, I do not think we can similarly draft the wife. Yet under this proposed constitutional amendment, no distinction could be drawn as between them.

Mr. CAIN. I think the distinction would be drawn on the basis of the need facing the country at that time.

But the adoption of this amendment would make available to our Government all the people of America, without reference to sex. I think the Senator will agree with me that if and when there is a war in the future we are going to need, more than we have ever previously obtained, the services of every man, woman, and child, in the world of tomorrow.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The adoption of this amendment would add so much confusion and difficulty and would place such a burden on our armed establishments, that I fail to see how we could have a very effective armed establishment at all.

For instance, Mr. President, consider a family consisting of a father, a mother, and three children. If the father is drafted into the armed establishment, someone has to stay with the children. Under this amendment, how could we say that since the mother is the homemaker, she should be the one to stay with the children? That could not be said, because the amendment provides that no distinction on account of sex can be made. In that event, if the father were drafted, it would be necessary to draft the mother also. Perhaps the mother could be drafted, and the father could be left at home to take care of the children; but that has never been in line with our social thinking.

Mr. President, the amendment might very well eliminate rape as a crime, inasmuch as by definition it usually involves an act of aggression on the part of a male. Certainly by any reasonable classification, a law which defined an act of aggression on the part of a man, as distinguished from a woman, would automatically be repealed. It is impossible to foretell what effect the proposed constitutional amendment, if adopted, might have on so-called statutory rape, which concerns intercourse between a man and a woman who has not attained the age of consent, as provided by State law. In any event, the amendment would cast confusion on the status of all laws of that nature, which have been developed out of the sound social experience over a period of many, many years.

How about the divorce laws, Mr. President? I suppose practically all States, with perhaps one or two exceptions, have at the present time laws to the effect that a husband's failure to provide for his family shall be grounds for divorce. Such laws necessarily would be repealed, because there could be no superior duty on the part of the husband to provide for the family.

Then, Mr. President, how about all the laws for the special protection of widows? In Tennessee—and I think this is true in all other States of the Union—if the husband should, by will, leave all his property and all his other assets to someone other than the widow, to the exclusion of the widow, all the widow has to do is, at the filing of the will, to say, "I dissent"; and in that event, she automatically gets her dower right. Is it the intention of the Members of the Senate to take away the dower right of women? Yet that necessarily would have to be the effect of this amendment, because under it no distinction could be drawn as between the sexes; and any State law which provides a special right for women would automatically go by the wayside, into the discard.

Then, Mr. President, under the laws of Tennessee—and I think the same provision is made in the laws of all the other States—women have a right for a year's support, which is always set aside by act of a commission, and very generously so. Such a provision is absolutely necessary in the interest and for the protection of the woman and of the family, in order that she and the children may have a means of support during the period when she must establish herself and get on her own feet. Those laws would necessarily be repealed if this amendment were placed in effect.

Mr. President, almost all our compensation laws, including the United States Compensation Act, make special provision for the welfare of women. The compensation laws of most of the States provide for women benefits which are not provided, on the other side of the picture, for men; that is to say, if a woman sustains an injury or loses her life, under the compensation law her husband may or may not be able to receive a certain amount of money; but under those laws the woman always receives a payment if her husband suffers an injury or loses his life.

Then, Mr. President, the Congress passed the Mann Act, to prohibit and punish the transportation of women across State lines for immoral purposes. Does the Congress wish to repeal the Mann Act by the passage of this proposed legislation? Will anyone deny that the Mann Act is not based upon a distinction on account of sex, a difference of sex? Will any lawyer deny that if we are going to abridge and repeal any law passed by the Congress of the United States on account of a difference of sex, the Mann Act will not be repealed?

Furthermore, Mr. President, how about the divorce and alimony laws? Over a period of a long, long time, the States of the Union have provided for alimony, which is in the public interest, for the protection of women and the support of the children. The divorce laws of all the States provide differences as to the marital conduct or relationship between men and women, requiring that the first burden of responsibility for support of the children be on the husband, and giving the wife a right to secure a divorce if the husband does not support the wife and the children. Mr. President, is it in the public interest immediately to abridge those laws, which are for the protection of women and children?

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. Does the Senator know of any State in the Union in which husbands can sue their wives for alimony, as of the present time?

Mr. KEFAUVER. It seems to me that I did read that in one State that is authorized; but I am not certain.

Mr. CAIN. I have been told—although I do not know it to be a fact—that there are 13 States in which that question has already been resolved, and in which it is now thought perfectly proper that alimony constitutes a two-way street.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I know that in my own State—and think this is true of most other States—the alimony statute particularly refers to the fact that it shall be available for women; it is not a general alimony statute. But I had the impression that probably one State had such a provision.

There are community-property laws in many of the States, under which property in which the wife has an interest is treated as belonging to both husband and wife. I have read a discussion to the effect that the benefit secured to women in the community-property States would be abolished if the proposed amendment were made a part of the Constitution. Certainly it is a matter which the Members of the Senate from those eight States, who have fought so long and so hard to retain community-property laws, should examine carefully to determine the effect of the proposed amendment. The husband is the manager of the community property during the joint lives, but he cannot dispose of it with intent to defraud the wife's rights, nor can he dispose of her share by his will. Upon his death, one-half the community property goes to his widow. Under the community property laws, during the continuance of the marriage relation, the wife cannot exercise any of the powers of a coowner either against her husband or against third persons, except that she can bind the community by her contracts for necessities.

The community-property laws are inextricably woven into the entire fabric of the law, institutions and customs in these eight States. The amendment, by requiring a drastic unscrambling and reallocation of rights and duties which presently form the basis in community-property States of a stable society, will shake its very foundations. The proponents of the amendment, in their fervor to eliminate certain inequalities, appear to be willing to undertake a revolution in property and family relations in these States which would be most unsettling.

Let us come now to a consideration of certain of the special laws passed for the protection of women engaged in industry. In the State of Tennessee I think about 22 special laws have been placed on the statute books and constitute a great advancement for the special benefit of women who may be working. In the first place, it is provided that women, as distinguished from men, doing certain kinds of work, must be provided with seats. It is provided that they cannot engage in certain hazardous kinds of work, such as working in lead, when they are peculiarly susceptible to lead poisoning during pregnancy. It is provided that they cannot work in certain kinds of mines.

I think we ought to take the approach of studying what kind of work women can and cannot do by virtue of the difference between the sexes, and let the Commission make its recommendation to the various States. I know, for instance, that it is required in various States, I believe by law, that there be provided separate bathroom facilities for men and for women. I suppose so long as a manufacturer maintains separate facilities, there probably would be no complaint; but suppose a manufacturer should refuse to provide them; what law could be passed to require him to do so? Nothing could be written into the State law with respect to the different sexes. Various city ordinances contain provisions requiring separate facilities for men and women. Perhaps the hotels and the industries would go on providing separate facilities, but suppose they should refuse to do it; how then could a law be passed requiring it, if it were impossible to name men or women in the law, as prohibited by the proposed amendment?

We all know that certain discriminations have been practiced against the women of the Nation, in economic matters, in the matter of service on juries, and with respect to the kinds of work they may do. I think all Senators will agree that women should have an equal opportunity with men, that they should receive the same pay for the same kind of work, that they should enjoy equal political rights, and that certain duties are imposed upon them in connection with the exercise of those rights. But it is difficult for me to think that the Senate by one stroke is going to abolish all the special laws which have been passed for the benefit of the family, laws which have been demanded by society, and which State legislatures over a period of many years have passed. I do not think the Senate, carte blanche, is going to abolish all the laws for the protection of women in industry. We are not going to repeal automatically the Federal statutes, such as the Mann Act, and many others, which have been enacted for the special benefit of women. The subject is one we should consider very carefully before voting upon it.

I am aware that the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] said the Congress and Senate had no responsibility in the matter of constitutional amendments, or but very little responsibility and that the Congress was only the means or the avenue through which the amendments could be submitted to the people. It is impossible for me to go along with that statement. Most of us know that the Congress of the United States must be convinced that the amendment would be in the public interest before submitting it. I have heard Members both of the House and of the Senate today say they did not believe in the amendment, but that they would fight for its submission to the people. That is not carrying out the responsibilities of the Members of the Congress, as I see it, as defined and provided by the founding fathers in the Constitutional Convention. Certainly the very fact that a two-thirds vote of the Senate and of the House of Representatives is required before an amendment can be submitted to the legislatures, or to the people, is evidence that the framers of the Constitution not only thought we should consider but that we should consider carefully such matters, and that two-thirds of the Members should favor the proposed amendment before its submission.

Mr. President, I am not offering the bill, S. 1430, as an amendment, for the purpose of delay or merely for the purpose of opposing the pending joint resolution. I offer it in the full belief that it is the answer to the problem. I hope that before the Senate comes to a final vote, Senators will consider the substitute and the support it has among women workers and among other women generally throughout the Nation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I have been impressed by the address which the very able Senator from Tennessee has made, and I wonder if the parliamentary situation is such that I may be privileged to ask a few questions of him?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I shall yield to the Senator for that purpose if the parliamentary situation is such that I may properly do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the Senator claiming the floor again?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I do not want to claim the floor again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator cannot yield unless he claims it.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, is it the intention, after the executive session, to go back into legislative session?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the intention is to take a recess as in executive session.

Mr. CAIN. I would object to that, Mr. President, only for the reason that I wish to offer a statement of approximately 15 minutes' duration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator may offer it in executive session.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington withdraws his objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the motion is agreed to.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. McCARRAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

James Michael McInerney, of New York, to be an Assistant Attorney General to fill an existing vacancy.

By Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

Robert H. Mollohan, of West Virginia, to be United States marshal for the northern district of West Virginia, vice Russell Nichols, term expired.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Tennessee has the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington wish to be recognized at this time?

Mr. CAIN. I should like to be recognized, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington is recognized.

THE COAL SITUATION IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON AND ELSEWHERE IN THE NORTHWEST

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Washington is of the opinion that everyone who reads or watches television or listens to the radio, knows that the State of Washington is in serious trouble because of the prevailing shortage of coal. It is the considered view of responsible citizens in Washington State that an emergency exists today throughout large areas of the Pacific Northwest. In recent days I have been urged by the State I proudly represent to do everything in my power to prevent and relieve the conditions which are bringing real suffering every day to thousands of citizens whose homes and businesses are situated several thousand miles from here. The only power which I possess as a United States Senator in this national question of whether there is or is not an emergency because of a lack of coal is to make certain that citizens whom I represent are given an opportunity to speak for themselves.

The President of the United States was quoted in the New York Times of Friday,

January 20, as having said that he and he alone had the responsibility for determining whether a national emergency existed. The Times story by Louis Stark said this in part:

Patiently but firmly the President insisted that the decision as to the actual time of a national emergency was his to make. When he felt there was an emergency he promised to so declare and to take whatever action was necessary.

"In other words the emergency is not here?" he was asked.

The President replied in the negative.

Then he was asked: "If things go on as they are how long do you think it will be before there is a national emergency?"

"Your guess is as good as mine," was the reply.

Asked whether an emergency such as is mentioned in the labor-relations law was "threatening," Mr. Truman said he did not care to answer that question.

The junior Senator from Washington has no way of knowing when the President will determine if an emergency exists. I can only conclude that the President is attempting to keep in touch with the acute suffering which has been inflicted upon millions of innocent American citizens. The majority leader, the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois, recently called these conditions to the attention of our Chief Executive. That was some days ago. So far as I know the President has not replied to his Senate majority leader. If an administration spokesman in the Senate fails to secure an answer from the Chief Executive, there is little reason to assume that the President will reply to a member of the opposition party in the Senate.

There is a better chance, I think, that the President of the United States will want to read and consider the statements submitted to me by citizens in Washington State. I do not know that these people are either Republicans or Democrats. They have not written about politics. They are cold, they are miserable, and they are asking for some relief. They say that conditions are bad and are likely to become much worse. All they ask is that the law of the land, which was written and approved by the Congress, ought to be employed for their benefit. I think their advice is both reasonable and pressing, but so far as I know there is nothing that I, as a Senator, can do about it. The President of the United States has said that he will determine the question in due time.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that a handful of the telegrams and letters which I have recently received from ordinary but very responsible individuals be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the telegrams and letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPOKANE, WASH., January 17, 1950.
Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
Washington, D. C.:

Today's spot check of eastern Washington and northern Idaho shows that many communities are out of coal. Practically all of them will be out by the end of this week. Spokane is hard-pressed and will be out before supplies can be replenished. This area is 10 days' transportation time from our major source of supply. We depend almost entirely upon Utah and Wyoming mines for our coal and their production has been reduced to less than 50 percent of normal by the 3-day workweek. Railroads have first priority on all production, power plants, hospitals, industrial contracts, and schools come next, there is little left for retail yards to ration out to homes and small businesses. We have just had one of the worst blizzards in the history of this area and extreme cold weather is continuing. We ask that you do everything within your power to hasten the full-time production of coal. An emergency does exist here.

POTLATCH YARDS, INC.,
Colfax, Wash., January 7, 1950.
Hon. HARRY CAIN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CAIN: The coal situation has gotten to the point whereby it is almost unbearable due to the dictates of John Lewis.

If there is any possible chance to enact legislation to the end that these dictates can be ended, I wish you would use your influence.

The schools and hospitals of Colfax and many other businesses and homes are in desperate circumstances due to the shortage of coal.

Mines supplying this community are unable to serve us due to the 2- and 3-day workweek.

Very respectfully yours,

F. R. GREENGO.

UNION COAL CO.,
Yakima, Wash., January 16, 1950.
Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senator of Washington,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CAIN: On behalf of the people in this area who rely on us to furnish them with coal, you are now advised that our supply, as of today, is so depleted that we are now down to emergency deliveries only. Within the next few days the public in this area will be actually suffering for lack of heat. This situation applies to all dealers in the Yakima Valley. There are no coal supplies available to us.

Coal supplies for public schools in Yakima and Yakima County are so low that schools will be without adequate heat in a few days and closing is imminent. Heat for Yakima's public buildings served by central heating will be curtailed this week. The coal shortage is so acute and so widespread that outside areas are unable to assist. Having no coal we have no answer to the public except: "Lewis." The people are now becoming bitter and we are helpless to aid or answer them. We can now turn only to you and your fellow Congressmen and Senators to take prompt action to alleviate the drastic situation which is now upon us.

We are now faced with an "emergency." We are in the midst of a crisis which cannot be sidestepped. The interests of this firm are now secondary to the relief of the public. This area is 3 weeks away from the coal supply. Full production in the mines today would still leave us without coal for 3 weeks. The shortage of coal, due to the monopoly of Lewis, is so widespread and so grave that we feel entirely justified in demanding—not pleading for—immediate action. We urgently request that you at once make use of the full extent of your position to invoke the operation of the Taft-Hartley Act and to take any other necessary action to bring about full production of the coal mines now. There is no cause for waiting to see if the relief won't come automatically. Our coal is gone. The dealers in this area and wherever else we inquire are down to emergency deliveries now. The coal supply for this whole area will be completely exhausted in the next few days without the most severe curtailment and refusal of coal to thousands actually in dire need. Curtailment starts this week for public buildings. Lewis must be muzzled.

The interests of the thousands of people in this area, whom you represent, require your immediate action. Certainly we must be able, at least, to count on our own Congressmen and Senators to fight vigorously to alleviate actual suffering. The present outrage can and must be brought to an abrupt end. We confidently expect your immediate and best efforts to bring about full-scale production of coal at the earliest possible moment.

Yours very truly,

NONA L. GOODWIN.

BUCHANAN FUEL CO.,
Yakima, Wash., January 12, 1950.
Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senator,
Fourth Washington District,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CAIN: We are writing you in behalf of the people of the Yakima Valley who rely on us to furnish them with coal.

We have been in the fuel business for over 32 years and never in our history have we experienced anything like this, even during the war; emergencies like this didn't exist. In the fall we bought all the supply we could handle just in case of strikes but now things have gone too far. Our supply is completely gone and there is no relief in sight.

If Lewis and his miners can't be controlled, can't something be done to meet this emergency? How about the millions on relief rolls; things just don't add up; here we are paying taxes to support people on relief or one kind of aid or another and we can't get coal just for the mining.

Certainly we can rely on our Senators and Congressmen from our own area to fight vigorously to alleviate actual suffering. We do expect your immediate action to bring about full-scale production of coal at the earliest possible moment.

Yours very truly,

COLIN S. CARSON, Manager.

POTLATCH YARDS, INC.,
Seattle, Wash., January 9, 1950.
Hon. HARRY CAIN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: The writer is associated with a retail firm handling fuel, the Potlatch Yards, Inc., with yards in many towns throughout the State of Washington. My particular work is calling at these yards, trying to assist the managers in their work.

In every place of business, without exception, they plead for coal. You, Senator, cannot realize the true picture without going to the firms that have been the source of supply, whose responsibility to their customers always has been to furnish coal.

These owners and managers need your assistance. You men, representing the families now without coal, are respectfully requested that action be taken to force miners back into the mines, so that schools may remain open, that individual homes may be warm.

Respectfully yours,

C. J. CASEY.

TEKOA, WASH., January 11, 1950.
Hon. HARRY CAIN,
Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We respectfully wish to call your very earnest attention to the conditions existing over the Pacific Northwest, which is very much effected and brought about by the demands of the coal labor dictator, and the carrying out of these demands, by the United Mine Workers, which has caused an impossible situation among the mines, that are our sources of supply, of coal for this community.

Should this condition continue, it no doubt will bring much suffering to many families, particularly where there is no natural gas, and many homes and industries depend entirely on coal for fuel for heat.

We urgently ask you to use your influence and power to prevent and relieve these conditions.

Yours truly,

S. H. LEDFORD.

MATSON FRUIT CO.,
Yakima, Wash., January 13, 1950.
Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have been forced just recently to take over the management of the Yakima Cascade Fuel Co., of which I have owned control for the past 3 years.

Our worst problem today is to get supplies of coal to take care of our customers and this situation is getting worse by the hour.

Is Lewis going to run the country or are we going to do something to curb him? You know what should be done and we ask that you move fast.

Very truly yours,

ROY A. MATSON.

YAKIMA, WASH., January 13, 1950.
Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senator From Washington,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.:

Your immediate and vigorous action is urged to invoke Taft-Hartley Act at once to break hold of Lewis on coal industry. Crisis exists today in central Washington. Yakima's coal reserves are now gone. Widespread suffering is imminent. Coal supply for public schools is down to a few days only. Supply for central heating of public buildings in Yakima requires curtailment of heat this week. The public is enraged. Full mine production today would still take 3 weeks to relieve this area. The crisis is now beyond political considerations. Only immediate action can avoid severe suffering.

United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.:

Regardless statement President that no emergency exists account Lewis coal program, shortage coal preventing eastern railroads hauling empty refrigerator cars west-bound for delivery their western connections. Only loaded cars and passengers being hauled, so says President Gavin, Great Northern. Today only 350 empty refrigerator cars on line Great Northern. Shortage exists on Milwaukee, Northern Pacific roads. Apple shippers Wenatchee district not furnished fourth cars absolutely necessary daily. Preponderance large-size apples this season makes imperative apples move now not months later. Railroads pay only mileage on refrigerator cars, no cost to them when not rolling. Can you help relieve situation immediately.

RENTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Renton, Wash., January 18, 1950.
Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: Our chamber of commerce, at its regular weekly meeting held this date, directed me to send to President Truman and the Senators and Representatives from Washington State in the Congress, a copy of a telegram sent to John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers, with reference to the coal situation in our city.

The copy of the telegram sent Lewis yesterday is attached hereto.

Yours truly,

HENRY J. REYNOLDS,
Secretary-Manager.

P. S.—A copy of the reply to our telegram has just been received in this office, which is attached hereto. For your information that part of the telegram "He advised this office that he has made suggestions which would eliminate any coal shortage referred to in your telegram" means for the mine operators to sign a contract with the union, which is little comfort to the people faced with the coal situation in our city.

JANUARY 17, 1950.

JOHN L. LEWIS,
United Mine Workers Building,
Washington, D. C.:

At the suggestion of our good friend Sam Nichols, district No. 10 mine president, we strongly urge you to permit more workdays in our local mines whose 3-day effort has been seriously curtailed due to snow, blizzard, and zero conditions unusual to our area, and who have commitments to supply our local housing authority, consisting of nearly 3,000 units, who now have less than 4 days' supply of coal on hand. Aside from the serious impact the lack of coal will have on the economy of our city of 17,000, these people in the emergency war housing for veterans depend solely on coal for their heat and cooking, without which untold suffering will occur and threaten the health of the community. These units have only 1-ton bins, nearly all of which are empty. We appeal to you to seriously consider our situation from a humanitarian standpoint.

RENTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
BOARD OF DIRECTORS,
By HENRY J. REYNOLDS,
Executive Secretary.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 18, 1950.

HENRY J. REYNOLDS,
Executive Secretary,
Renton Chamber of Commerce:

In the temporary absence of President John L. Lewis your telegram of January 17 has been referred to me for reply. I have discussed the subject matter contained in your telegram with District President Sam Nichols. He advised this office that he has made suggestions which would eliminate any coal shortage referred in your telegram. Under these circumstances there is nothing this office could do at the present time.

W. A. BOYLE,
Assistant to the President, United Mine Workers of America.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, there is small reason to doubt that those who sent the telegrams and letters are telling the truth. They have no reason to exaggerate the suffering. They have no cause to mislead us or the President of the United States. If the President of the United States will only go to the State of Washington to verify the claims he will certainly strive to find a remedy and find it soon.

To my mind, Mr. President, the President of the United States is an outstanding paradox. Admitting my prejudice, I find it difficult to determine what his qualifications are and what he has really been in years gone by. The President of the United States is constantly telling the Congress what it ought to do. Yet, on occasions, he tells groups of citizens that he is not qualified to tell them what ought to be done. I want to offer just one example of what I mean. The President recently spoke at a private dinner of representatives of the Nation's Federal Reserve System which was attended by Governors of that System, by district chairmen, and by directors of the New York and Minneapolis banks. Reporters were not permitted to cover the dinner at the Carlton Hotel but the White House later made public the text of Mr. Truman's impromptu remarks in which he asserted:

I haven't any business to be discussing things financial with the financial brains that are before me tonight. I am just a farmer from Missouri who had bad luck and got kicked into a big job. * * *

I am just an ordinary citizen of this great Republic of ours, who has the greatest responsibility in the world and whose responsibility is your responsibility, and for that reason it is necessary that all of us make every effort possible to make successful the goal which we are attempting to attain.

And that is peace in the world—peace in Europe, peace in Asia, peace in South America, peace in Africa, peace in the Western Hemisphere, and the assumption of the leadership necessary to bring that about.

In these remarks, Mr. President, the President of the United States has said that he does not know anything about finance, because he is just a farmer from Missouri and that the great responsibility which is his ought to be shared with others.

How does one share a responsibility, if the President of the United States maintains that he and he alone bears that responsibility? If the President of the United States thinks he is not qualified to discuss financial affairs with the Federal Reserve Board because of his stated reason that he is only a farmer from Missouri, does it logically follow that he, as a farmer from Missouri, is qualified to determine the coal-shortage question? I am guessing that as a farmer in Missouri our Chief Executive was as little exposed to the problem of coal as he was to the problem of things financial.

Mr. President, the junior Senator from Washington supports the criticisms and the statements which have been offered to him on the coal question by the citizens of Washington State. The statements have been offered for the RECORD where they may be read and understood by others. I hope they will assist, because comparable statements have been submitted from other States in the Union, the President of the United States in reaching an immediate determination. In my considered view, the President of the United States would be well advised to go from Washington, D. C., to Washington State, where he could find out for himself what the average citizen is thinking about and states to be a fact.

He ought to take one of his famed junkets around the country. He seemingly gains great satisfaction from threatening us with one of these trips whenever the Congress hesitates to approve a portion of his Fair Deal program. He blithely tells the country on those occasions that he will come and tell them a thing or two about the dereliction of those in the Senate and in the House of Representatives. The President of the United States is a strong believer, as all of us are, in taking national issues to the people. I think our national coal shortage is a national issue, and the President of the United States ought to remove himself for a time from his well-heated quarters in Washington, D. C., and in Key West, Fla., in order that he might travel among those who suffer, so that he can the sooner answer the question which has been put to him by Americans generally and by Members of both Houses of the Congress: "Mr. President, will you make up your mind—because you say you are the only one who can—concerning whether a coal shortage is present today?" There would be some real point, Mr. President, to a trip like this by the President of the United States, and I would encourage citizens throughout this land to demand their Chief Executive come to them and come now.

The President of the United States will not learn very much about real suffering for as long as he remains in Washington, D. C. To satisfy my curiosity I talked the other day with some of those who are responsible for providing heat for the buildings in which the President of the United States and many of us work and live. These authorities said that Washington, D. C., had nothing to worry about because there was plenty of coal today to keep all of us warm and that more than enough would be available at all times.

SMEAR ATTACK AGAINST J. EDGAR HOOVER—PETITION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, we are well aware of the fact that the greatest single enemy of the Communist movement in the United States is the distinguished head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation—one of our most able public servants in American life today—the Honorable John Edgar Hoover. Because he has been so effective a guardian of this Republic, as well as being the scourge of organized crime, he has won the undying hatred of every subversive organization of the extreme left, and, we might say, of the extreme right in our country.

The Communists in particular have mobilized every type of devious tactic, every strategem, every cunning approach, in order to smear Mr. Hoover, to seek to put him on the defensive, to neutralize his efforts and hamstring his work.

It is amazing to me, Mr. President, how the Communists have been able to mobilize individuals and groups who have no sympathy with communism but who have fallen for the Red anti-Hoover line hook, line, and sinker.

We are all aware of the fact that the FBI is doing top secret work in protecting American security against internal sabotage, espionage, and so forth.

Americans sometimes forget, Mr. President. But we should remember December 1941. We should remember with what effectiveness America was protected, and how this organization had been able in the previous months to discover and to get its hand on every subversive agent in this country, and we should remember how free we were from sabotage, and the like.

We must recognize the fact that the FBI cannot fight with kid gloves against a diabolical enemy which does not fight with kid gloves, but which uses the most advanced types of communication, transportation, and propaganda.

I urge my colleagues to consider the fact that the FBI is our foremost advance agent in the cold war against communism and every Senator should ask himself the question, "What are the hidden motives behind the present attack on the part of various sources against the FBI?"

The people of America have faith in Mr. Hoover. It is a faith which has been justified by the keen, responsible discretion and judgment with which he has always exercised his functions. As a token of the faith of the people of America in the chief G-man, I have in my hand the text of a petition just received from Mr. Chester S. Bell, attorney at law in Neenah, Wis. I believe that this petition, which came spontaneously from the grass roots of America, indicates the feelings of our people on this subject. I ask unanimous consent that its text and a list of some of the signers be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition, with some of the names attached, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 20, 1950.

To Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned American citizens, each a registered voter, hereby request you to oppose any attempt to force the resignation of J. Edgar Hoover. We believe the Federal Bureau of Investigation is the strongest defense of our Government against subversive organizations, and we oppose the opening of FBI files to any Communist group.

RECESS

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the very able Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] has completed the scheduled hourly needling of the President, I now move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. CAIN. Reserving the right to object, will my friend, the junior Senator from Illinois, agree with me that on occasions the President not only needs but is deserving of a needle? If we are in agreement on that point, I suggest that the Senate promptly agree to his motion to recess.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am certainly not in agreement with the Senator from Washington that the President deserves to be needled. I am sure that our friends across the aisle would not be happy unless they did it every hour on the hour.

I renew my motion that the Senate recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

Mr. CAIN. Reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEFAUVER in the chair). The Chair reminds the Senator from Washington that this is a motion to recess until noon tomorrow and is not a request for unanimous consent, so an objection is not in order. Does the Senator from Illinois withhold his motion?

Mr. CAIN. If the Senator from Illinois is anxious to recess the Senate, it is quite agreeable to the junior Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois that the Senate take a recess until noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in executive session, took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 24, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

MONDAY, JANUARY 23, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, Thou knowest our frame, and rememberest that we are dust. As we wait in prayer, we ask Thee to bless the sacred silences of every heart, and thus direct us in the performance of the duties of this day.

As guardians and trustees of the future of our country, direct us through the perils of these times. Without hesitation and vacillation, may we work in unison for a common goal, diffused with a consuming energy and devotion that we may do what honor and conscience dictate. Grant that fear and selfish ambition may not disturb our unity nor our decisions, but that we may do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with our God. In the Master's name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 20, 1950, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDaniel, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate disagrees to the conference report on the bill (S. 1008) entitled "An act to define the application of the Federal Trade Commission Act and the Clayton Act to certain pricing practices."

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the House to the above-entitled bill, asks a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. MCCARRAN, Mr. O'CONOR, and Mr. WILEY to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice President has appointed Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina and Mr. LANGER members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of August 5, 1939, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain records of the United States Government," for the disposition of executive papers referred to in the report of the Archivist of the United States numbered 50–14.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to lay before the House a message from the President of the United States.

Mr. RANKIN. Very well, Mr. Speaker, then I will reserve my point of order.

REVISIONS IN TAX LAWS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President of the United States, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the reading of the President's message prevent the operation of the discharge rule today?

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I think all of us ought to hear the message of the President, and I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, my point of order comes first.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi did not make the point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. I know, but I reserved it.

The SPEAKER. Both gentlemen may make the point of order that a quorum is not present. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 10]

Barrett, Pa.	Crosser	Kilburn
Bland	Davis, Tenn.	LeFevre
Bonner	Dawson	Lemke
Bulwinkle	Elliott	Mack, Wash.
Burdick	Gilmer	Martin, Mass.
Chatham	Hart	Monroney
Cole, N. Y.	Hébert	Morrison
Corbett	Hobbs	Murphy
Nixon	Rich	Stockman
Pfeiffer, William L.	Sasscer	Walsh
Poulson	Shafer	Withrow
Rains	Simpson, Pa.	Zablocki
Reed, Ill.	Smathers
	Smith, Ohio

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 392 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

REVISIONS IN TAX LAWS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 451)

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the message.

The Clerk read the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

The tax policy of the United States Government is of major significance to the national welfare. Taxes are the means by which our people pay for the activities of the Government which are necessary to our survival and progress as a Nation. Decisions about Federal tax policy should be made in full recognition of the economic and budgetary situation, and should contribute to our national objectives of economic growth and broader opportunity for all our citizens.

At the present time, I believe we should make some revisions in our tax laws to improve the fairness of the tax system, to bring in some additional revenue, and to strengthen our economy.

Our general objective should be a tax system which will yield sufficient revenue in times of high employment, production, and national income to meet the necessary expenditures of the Government and leave some surplus for debt reduction. In the Budget Message, I estimated that receipts in the fiscal year 1951 will fall short of meeting expenditures by 5.1 billion dollars. This deficit will be due largely to the short-sighted tax reduction enacted by the 80th Congress, and to the present necessity for large expenditures for national security and world peace. Moreover, owing to the time lag between corporation earnings and tax payments, the 1949 decline in corporation profits will be reflected in lower tax receipts in the fiscal year 1951.

The policies I am recommending to the Congress are designed to reduce the deficit and bring about a budgetary balance as rapidly as we can safely do so. These policies are threefold: first, to hold expenditures to the lowest level consistent with the national interest; second, to encourage and stimulate business expansion which will result in more revenue; and third, to make a number of changes in the tax laws which will bring in some net additional revenue and at the same time improve the equity of our tax system.

First, as to Government expenditures.

I have recently transmitted to the Congress a budget containing recommendations for appropriations and estimates of expenditures for the fiscal year 1951. This budget was carefully prepared with a view toward holding expenditures to the lowest possible levels consistent with the requirements of national security, world peace, economic growth, and the well-being of our people.

The decisions of the Congress, as well as unpredictable changes in circumstances over the next 18 months, may alter in many particulars the character and amount of the expenditures contemplated in this budget. Nevertheless, I believe the estimates contained in the budget represent the most realistic appraisal that it is possible to make at this time of the necessary expenditures in 1951. I believe the Congress will generally concur in this view after it has had an opportunity to consider these estimates carefully.

The expenditures estimated in the 1951 budget have been reduced by about 900 million dollars below the level estimated for the present fiscal year. The policies recommended in the budget will permit further reductions in subsequent years as the costs of some of the extraordinary postwar programs continue to decline.

To achieve these reductions we must continue to practice rigid economy. At the same time, it would be self-defeating to cripple activities which are essential to our national strength. It will require wisdom and courage to find and hold fast to the course of wise economy without straying into the field of foolish budget slashes.

Second, as to the strength and growth of our national economy.

We cannot achieve and maintain a balanced budget without a strong and prosperous economy. A recession in economic activity would call for increased Government expenditures at the same time that revenues were reduced, thus creating greater budget deficits.

At the present time, the economy of the United States is growing, and we have every reason to expect it to continue to expand if we follow the right policies. It is largely the task of private business to achieve this growth. The Government, however, can and should contribute to it. Through such cooperation, national employment and income will grow. This will result, in time, in increasing Government revenues.

Just as the condition of our national economy has an overriding effect upon our efforts to balance the budget, so do our policies for managing the Federal budget have a decisive effect upon the national economy. Drastic reductions in Federal expenditures in the wrong places and at the wrong time could have serious disruptive effects throughout our economy.

Government revenue policies are as important in our economy as Government expenditure policies. Events of the last few years have proved that our economy can grow and prosper, and that employment, production and incomes can increase, at the same time that individuals and businesses are paying taxes which are high by prewar standards. However, taxes can and do have an important effect upon business conditions and economic activity. It should be our constant objective to improve our tax system so that the required revenues can be obtained without impairing the private initiative and enterprise essential to continued economic growth.

We should always keep in mind that the maintenance of a sound fiscal position on the part of the Government is a long-range matter. Nothing could be more foolhardy than to attempt to bring about a balanced budget in 1951 by measures that would make it impossible to maintain a balanced budget in the following years.

Third, as to changes in the tax laws.

If, over the next few years, we hold expenditures to the minimum necessary levels and at the same time follow policies which contribute to stable economic growth, we can look forward to steady progress toward a balanced budget. Nevertheless, we should not rely only upon budgetary economy and upon economic expansion to produce a balanced budget. We should accelerate the attainment of this objective by changes in the tax laws. Drastic increases in tax rates, just as in the case of drastic cuts in essential expenditures, might prove to be self-defeating. Our primary objective should be to improve and strengthen our revenue system for the long run.

Under these circumstances, I am now recommending a number of important revisions in our present tax system, to reduce present inequities, to stimulate business activity, and to yield about one billion dollars in net additional revenue.

In making changes in the tax laws, we should be sure they move toward, and not away from, the major principles of a good tax system. Our tax structure should recognize differences in ability to pay; it should provide incentives to new undertakings and the expansion of existing businesses; it should support the objective of increasing opportunities for all our citizens to obtain a better standard of living; and it should rigidly exclude unfairness or favoritism.

Over the years, we have made important progress in building a good tax system. However, much remains to be done. There is need further to improve the distribution of the tax load to make it conform better with tax paying ability. There is need to reduce taxes which burden consumption and handicap particular businesses. Moreover, we should eliminate tax loopholes which enable some few to escape their share of the cost of government at the expense of the rest of the American people.

Many of the important and desirable tax revisions which should be made must be postponed until the budget situation improves. Nevertheless, a number of those steps can and should be taken now.

First, I recommend that excise taxes be reduced to the extent, and only to the extent, that the resulting loss in revenue is replaced by revenue obtained from closing loopholes in the present tax laws.

The excise taxes are still at substantially their wartime levels. Some are depressing certain lines of business. Some burden consumption and fall with particular weight on low-income groups. Still others add to the cost of living by increasing business costs.

Since we are limited in the amount of reduction we can now afford, we should choose for reduction those taxes which have the most undesirable effects. I believe that reductions are most urgently needed in the excise taxes on transportation of property, transportation of persons, long-distance telephone and telegraph communications, and the entire group of retail excises, including such items as toilet preparations, luggage, and handbags.

If these revisions are made, we will have reduced the most serious inequities of our present excise taxes. We should go further just as quickly as budgetary conditions permit. At present, however, we should reduce excises only to the extent that the loss in revenue can be recouped by eliminating the tax loopholes which now permit some groups to escape their fair share of taxation.

The continued escape of privileged groups from taxation violates the fundamental democratic principle of fair treatment for all, and undermines public confidence in the tax system. While few of these loopholes by themselves involve major revenue losses, collectively they result in the loss of many hundreds of millions of dollars every year.

I wish to call the attention of the Congress to the more important of these loopholes. While some of them are of long standing, their injustice has been aggravated as the taxes assessed against the rest of the population have been increased. A tax concession to a favored few is always unfair, but it becomes a gross injustice against the rest of the population when tax rates are high. The case for the elimination of these inequities would be strong even if there were no need for replacement revenue. It is compelling when excise relief depends on it.

I know of no loophole in the tax laws so inequitable as the excessive depletion exemptions now enjoyed by oil and mining interests.

Under these exemptions, large percentages of the income from oil and mining properties escape taxation, year after year. Owners of mines and oil wells are permitted, after deducting all costs of doing business, to exclude from taxation on account of depletion as much as half of their net income. In the case of ordinary businesses, investment in physical assets is recovered tax-free through depreciation deductions. When the original investment has been recovered, a depreciation deduction is no longer allowed under the tax laws. In the case of oil and mining businesses, however, the depletion exemption goes on and on, year after year, even though the original investment in the property has already been recovered tax-free, not once but many times over.

Originally introduced as a moderate measure to stimulate essential production in the First World War, this special treatment has been extended during later years. At the present time these exemptions, together with another preferential provision which permits oil-well investment costs to be immediately deducted from income regardless of source, are allowing individuals to build up vast fortunes, with little more than token contributions to tax revenues.

For example, during the 5 years 1943 to 1947, during which it was necessary to collect an income tax from people earning less than $20 a week, one oil operator was able, because of these loopholes, to develop properties yielding nearly $5,000,000 in a single year without payment of any income tax. In addition to escaping the payment of tax on his large income from oil operations, he was also able through the use of his oil tax exemptions to escape payment of tax on most of his income from other sources. For the 5 years his income taxes totaled less than $100,000, although his income from nonoil sources alone averaged almost $1,000,000 each year.

This is a shocking example of how present tax loopholes permit a few to gain enormous wealth without paying their fair share of taxes.

I am well aware that these tax privileges are sometimes defended on the grounds that they encourage the production of strategic minerals. It is true that we wish to encourage such production. But the tax bounties distributed under present law bear only a haphazard relationship to our real need for proper incentives to encourage the exploration, development and conservation of our mineral resources. A forward-looking resources program does not require that we give hundreds of millions of dollars annually in tax exemptions to a favored few at the expense of the many.

Some tax loopholes have also been developed through the abuse of the tax exemption accorded educational and charitable organizations. It has properly been the policy of the Federal Government since the beginning of the income tax to encourage the development of these organizations. That policy should not be changed. But the few glaring abuses of the tax-exemption privilege should be stopped.

Responsible educational leaders share in the concern about the fact that an exemption intended to protect educational activities has been misused in a few instances to gain competitive advantage over private enterprise through the conduct of business and industrial operations entirely unrelated to educational activities.

There are also instances where the exemption accorded charitable trust funds has been used as a cloak for speculative business ventures, and the funds intended for charitable purposes, buttressed by tax exemption, have been used to acquire or retain control over a wide variety of industrial enterprises.

These and other unintended advantages can and should be removed without jeopardizing the basic purposes of those organizations which should rightly be aided by tax exemption.

A problem exists also with respect to life-insurance companies. The tax laws have always accorded favorable treatment to the income received by individuals from life-insurance policies and have made special provision for the taxation of life-insurance companies. As a result of a quirk in the present law, however, life-insurance companies have unintentionally been relieved of income taxes since 1946. This anomalous situation has meant that neither the companies nor their policy holders have paid taxes on more than 1.5 billion dollars of investment income per year, derived from productive assets worth about 60 billion dollars.

I understand that the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives has already undertaken to correct this situation for the past years. I urge that steps also be taken to develop a permanent system for the taxation of life-insurance companies which will remove the inequities of undertaxation in this field without impairing the ability of individuals to acquire life-insurance protection.

In addition to the tax loopholes I have described, there are a number of others which also represent inequities, and should be closed. Most of these permit individuals, by one device or another, to take unfair advantage of the difference between the tax rates on ordinary income and the lower tax rates on capital gains. As one example, under present law producers of motion pictures, and their star players, have attempted to avoid taxes by creating temporary corporations which are dissolved after making one film. By this device, their income from making the film, which ought to be taxed at the individual-income-tax rates, would be taxed only at the capital-gains rate. Thus, they might escape as much as two-thirds of the tax they should pay.

All these loopholes have been under joint study by the Treasury Department and the staff of the Congressional Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation. A practical program which would go far toward closing these loopholes can be enacted during the present session of the Congress. This would be a substantial step toward increasing the fairness of our tax system, and should add several hundred million dollars to its yield— sufficient revenue to permit substantial excise-tax reduction where it is most urgently needed.

I wish to make it very clear that I could not approve excise-tax reductions unless they were accompanied by provision for replacement of the revenue lost, because I am convinced that sound fiscal policy will not permit a weakening of our tax system at this time. Under present conditions, we cannot afford to reduce excise taxes first, in the hope that action will be taken later to make up for the loss in revenue.

Second, I recommend that the Congress enact legislation to provide one billion dollars in additional revenue, by revising and improving the estate and gift tax and the corporation tax laws. I believe that, under present economic conditions, this amount of additional revenue represents a proper balance between the objective of balancing the budget as soon as possible and the objective of coordinating tax adjustments with the requirements of continued prosperity.

A substantial part of the additional revenue should be obtained from revision of the estate- and gift-tax laws.

The Revenue Act of 1948 reduced the yield of the estate and gift taxes by one-third, or nearly 300 million dollars. Even before that act, estate and gift-tax yields were out of line with other revenues, and that act made the situation worse.

In originally enacting the estate tax in 1916, the Congress pointed out that "our revenue system should be more evenly and equitably balanced" and that a "larger portion of our necessary revenues" should be collected from the "inheritances of those deriving most protection from the Government." Our estate- and gift-tax laws at present fall far short of this objective. They now produce less than 2 percent of internal revenues, compared with 7 percent 10 years ago. To the extent that these taxes remain too low, the remainder of our tax structure must bear a disproportionate load.

The low yield from the estate and gift taxes is due to serious weaknesses in the present law.

These weaknesses include excessive exemptions, unduly low effective rates on most estates, and the fact that the law as written favors large estates over smaller ones, and leaves substantial amounts of wealth completely beyond the reach of the tax laws. Large fortunes may be transmitted from one generation to another free of estate or gift tax through the use of life estates. By this means, vast accumulations of wealth may completely escape tax over several generations.

Furthermore, the present law affords excessive opportunities for tax reduction by splitting between the gift and estate taxes the total amount of wealth transferred by an individual. This makes the tax liability depend, not upon the amount of wealth which an individual leaves to his family, but upon the manner in which he arranges the disposition of his wealth. If a man leaves his estate of $300,000 at death, one-half to his wife and one-half to his three children, an estate tax of $17,500 must be paid. If his equally well-to-do neighbor gives away $180,000 to his wife and three children over a 5-year period and leaves them the other $120,000 at death, no estate or gift tax whatever is paid. This difference in tax, whether it depends upon fortuitous circumstances or the caliber of legal counsel, is obviously unwarranted.

To strengthen the estate and gift-tax laws, several steps are necessary. The laws concerning the taxation of transfers by gift and by bequest, by outright disposition and through life estates, need to be coordinated to provide uniform treatment and a base for more effective taxation. In addition, the present exemptions should be reduced and the rates should be revised. These changes will not only bring in more revenue, but they will also improve the fairness of the estate- and gift-tax laws and bring these taxes nearer to their proper long-term place in our tax system.

The rest of the additional revenue should be obtained from adjustments in the corporation income tax. At the same time, certain improvements should be made in this tax.

I recommend a moderate increase in the tax rate applicable to that part of a corporation's income which is in excess of $50,000. At the same time, I recommend that the tax rate on corporate income between $25,000 and $50,000, which is now taxed at the excessively high "notch" rate of 53 percent, be reduced to the same rate that applies above $50,000.

These changes in the tax-rate structure would go far toward removing the handicaps which the present law places upon the expansion of small corporations. The removal of the excessive "notch" rate would reduce the taxes paid by medium-sized corporations whose continued growth is so essential to the dynamic expansion of our economy. The existing favorable tax rates for small corporations with incomes below $25,000 would be retained. The tax increase would be confined to less than one-tenth of all corporations.

Furthermore, I recommend that the loss carry-forward provision be extended from 2 to 5 years to provide more scope for offsetting losses of bad years against profits of subsequent years. This extension will give increased incentive to business investment affected by uncertain profit expectations. It will be particularly helpful to new businesses which, under the present provision permitting losses to be carried forward only 2 years, may be required to pay taxes over a period of several years during which they actually suffer a net loss.

At the same time that we make these changes in the tax laws to stimulate investment at home, we should make certain changes in the tax laws concerning income derived from foreign investments and personal services abroad. This would provide significant support to our efforts to extend financial and technical assistance to underdeveloped regions of the world.

Among the steps which should be taken at this time are to postpone the tax on corporate income earned abroad until it is brought home, to extend and generalize the present credit for taxes paid abroad, and to liberalize the foreign residence requirement for exemption of income earned abroad. These changes, together with the safeguards for our investors which we are in the process of negotiating with foreign governments, will provide real stimulation for the expansion of United States investment abroad.

The tax program I am recommending is designed to strengthen our tax system so that it will yield revenues sufficient to balance expenditures as they are further reduced over the next several years, and to provide some surplus for debt reduction. Because of the time lag in collecting taxes after their enactment, these recommendations will not result in any substantial increase in receipts in the fiscal year 1951, but they will result in larger revenues in subsequent years and, at the same time, substantially improve the structure of our tax system for the long run.

A sharp increase in taxes under present economic conditions would be unwise. However, in line with the policy of gearing changes in revenue laws to the needs of our economy, I would not hesitate, if strong inflationary or deflationary forces should appear, to support the use of all measures necessary to meet the situation, including more pronounced adjustment of tax rates upward or downward, as the case might be.

We have come through the war and a difficult transition period with the financial strength of our Government maintained and an economy producing far above prewar levels. We should continuously seek to sustain and improve these indispensable foundations for progress. The tax program I am recommending is an important and necessary means to that end.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 23, 1950.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana (interrupting the reading of the message). Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, after the Clerk has concluded the reading of the President's message, will it be in order for the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor to call up the FEPC bill?

The SPEAKER. If he is recognized, yes.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PETERSON. Will it also be in order for the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands to call up a resolution which has been in the Committee on Rules more than 21 days, which resolution has to do with statehood for the Territory of Alaska.

The SPEAKER. If he is recognized, yes.

The Clerk continued reading the President's message.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. COLMER (interrupting reading of the President's message). Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and fourteen Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 11]

Barrett, Pa.	Jennings	Rains
Bland	Jensen	Reed, N. Y.
Boggs, La.	Kilburn	Rich
Bulwinkle	LeFevre	Sasscer
Burdick	Lemke	Shafer
Chatham	Mack, Wash.	Simpson, Pa.
Crosser	Martin, Mass.	Smathers
Davis, Tenn.	Monroney	Smith, Ohio
Dawson	Murphy	Stockman
Elliott	Nixon	Walsh
Engle, Calif.	Pfeiffer,	Withrow
Gilmer	William L.	Zablocki
Hébert	Phillips, Calif.
Hobbs	Poulson

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and ninety-two Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

(The Clerk continued reading the President's message.)

Mr. RANKIN (interrupting the reading of the message). Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] A quorum is not present.

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 12]

Barrett, Pa.	Hobbs	Ribicoff
Boggs, La.	Kilburn	Rich
Bulwinkle	LeFevre	Sasscer
Burdick	Lemke	Shafer
Chatham	Mack, Wash.	Simpson, Pa.
Cox	Martin, Mass.	Smathers
Crosser	Murphy	Smith, Ohio
Davies, N. Y.	Nixon	Stockman
Davis, Tenn.	Pace	Walsh
Dawson	Pfeiffer,	Whitaker
Elliott	William L.	Withrow
Engle, Calif.	Phillips, Calif	Zablocki
Gilmer	Poulson
Hébert	Rains

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 392 Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Without objection, further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS of Georgia) there were—ayes 144, noes 11.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirty-one Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on this vote.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the motion to dispense with further proceedings on the call was agreed to.

(The Clerk concluded the reading of the President's message.)

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PETERSON].

ADMISSION OF ALASKA INTO THE UNION

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 2 (c) of rule XI I call up House Resolution 217, providing for the consideration of H. R. 331, a bill to provide for the admission of Alaska into the Union, which has remained in the Committee on Rules for more than 21 calendar days without being reported or acted upon.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I submit a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and in a division (demanded by Mr. COLMER) there were—ayes 17, noes 145.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the Speaker has counted the Members of the House several times, the roll has been called demonstrating that a quorum is present and that at this point the gentleman's motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. Under the circumstances, for the Chair that is a major operation.

The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and nine Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 13]

Barden	Hébert	Poulson
Barrett, Pa.	Hobbs	Rains
Bland	Kilburn	Rich
Boggs, La.	King	Sasscer
Bonner	LeFevre	Scudder
Bulwinkle	Lemke	Shafer
Burdick	McSweeney	Simpson, Pa.
Chatham	Mack, Wash.	Smathers
Crosser	Martin, Mass.	Smith, Ohio
Davies, N. Y.	Miles	Stockman
Davis, Tenn.	Murphy	Vinson
Dawson	Nixon	Walsh
Elliott	Pfeiffer,	Whitaker
Engle, Calif.	William L.	Withrow
Gilmer	Plumley	Zablocki

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and eighty-seven Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

On motion by Mr. McCORMACK, and by unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

ADMISSION OF ALASKA INTO THE UNION

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 331) to provide for the admission of Alaska into the Union. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Public Lands, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. PETERSON. I would rather not, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida declines to yield.

The gentleman from Florida is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, in order to proceed in an orderly way, I will yield one-half of the time to the ranking minority member of the committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

I now yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANKIN. While everything else seems to be going haywire, the clocks in this room are in bad shape; they do not keep the same time as between themselves nor do they show the time that is registered by the watches of the Members of the House. I make the point of order that these clocks ought to be corrected so that the Members of this House could at least tell the time of day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida is recognized.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Has the Speaker ruled on the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not a clock fixer.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, further on the point of order, I am not asking the Speaker to fix the clocks. There are clock fixers here who are supposed to keep these clocks in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will try to take charge of that, too.

The gentleman from Florida is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, this is an honest effort to bring up legislation which has been reported out by one of the legislative committees of the House, reported out last year, on March 10, with only one dissenting vote in the committee. That was not actually a dissenting vote but more or less a reservation so that the vote would not be unanimous. A series of hearings was held on the bill extending back into previous Congresses.

The bill was reported out of the Committee on Public Lands. The committee instructed its chairman, after time had elapsed, to prepare a resolution under this rule to bring it up, when the Committee on Rules did not report it and after we had used every reasonable effort to get a rule under the orderly procedure of the House. This year the Committee on Public Lands again instructed its chairman to utilize this method. So that you may know that we have not tried to rush the thing, that we have tried to be fair and proceed in an orderly way, let me remind you that this bill was reported on March 10, 1949. The resolution to bring it up was filed on May 14, 1949. I would have brought it up in the latter part of the last session, but you will recall that at that time great uncertainty prevailed as to when the session would adjourn. Time ran along, 3 or 4 weeks at a stretch. In the closing days of the session I did not want to do anything to complicate the legislative program.

At the present time, therefore, having been instructed by the committee, the chairman of the committee is calling it up under the rules of the House, and this is an honest effort to pass a bill which has been reported favorably, a bill on a subject contained in the platforms of both the major political parties in which they pledged statehood to Alaska and Hawaii.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I support the resolution and I support the bill, but I want to say to the chairman of the committee that in having called up this bill at the present time to block the calling up of the FEPC bill, the gentleman has injured the chances of statehood for Alaska.

Mr. PETERSON. I do not feel that way because we were the first ones to introduce our resolution. I want it considered in an orderly way. Our resolution was actually introduced before the FEPC bill was.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. But the gentleman had a chance to call it up on January 9 and he did not. It is a strange coincidence that he calls it up this morning when the proponents of FEPC were seeking recognition.

Mr. PETERSON. On January 9 there were a great many Members of the House who had not arrived.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Of course, the Speaker could have used his discretion and could have recognized the gentleman from Michigan to call up FEPC.

Mr. PETERSON. On January 9 a great many Members of the House had not arrived because they know that there is not a great deal of controversial business brought up in the first few days of the session.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUCAS. Of course, Chairman LESINSKI could have called up his FEPC bill during the last session of the Congress.

Mr. PETERSON. I was waiting for a longer period than he was. It will be recalled that during the last session we were not sure exactly when the adjournment date was going to be. We would take on a drive and go steadily, then there would be a lull. I did not want to do anything to complicate the orderly procedure at that time. This is the second session of the Congress and unless we act during the early part of the session we will come to the time again when there will be complications.

I felt it my duty to do this. In addition to that, may I say that the President of the United States in his message to the Congress at the opening of the session called particular attention to the statehood bills for Alaska and Hawaii and said that even those who might object to it should not object to its coming up and having a fair vote by the elected representatives of the people.

Mr. REDDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. REDDEN. I take it that it was not up to the gentleman to determine whether he would be recognized this morning nor was it up to the gentleman from New York as to who would be recognized but that it was up to the Speaker who is the one to determine that. He recognized the gentleman from Florida to bring up his bill.

Mr. PETERSON. In all fairness, may I say that I was trying my best to get recognized and I am making a presentation showing how long the bill has been pending.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself two additional minutes.

Mr. Speaker, as chairman of a standing committee, I feel it my duty to carry out the mandate of my committee. In this instance I heard the testimony given before the committee and I feel therefore that the bill is meritorious and that it should be passed. This is the only procedure we have left to us.

I hope the Members will vote favorably on the rule and ultimately vote favorably for statehood.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman's point of order is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-four Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FULTON. If the sponsors of this bill for Alaska know that they will be injuring the cause of Alaska statehood by getting themselves tangled up in a political dispute of precedents between the Alaska bill and the FEPC bill, would the gentleman be willing to step aside for the FEPC bill?

Mr. PETERSON. At the present time that is not in my hands. I have now been recognized and the bill is before the House under the rules of the House. However, I will say in all fairness, I have felt that we were entitled to first recognition. The rule is silent as to whom the Speaker shall recognize. Our resolution antedates the FEPC resolution. The Alaska bill was reported out of committee a long time ahead of the FEPC bill, and the 21 days had run a long time before the rule would be made applicable to the FEPC, and my committee instructed me to bring it up. But, during the closing days of the last session there was a period of time when we did not know when we were going to adjourn from one week to another, and I just thought that we should not bring it up then. Now we face the point that if we do not bring it up it will be longer delayed, and it will be dead in this session.

Mr. FULTON. Was there any prior arrangement with the gentleman and any of the so-called coalition group to try to get prior recognition for another purpose?

Mr. PETERSON. There was not. In fact, some are filibustering against my bill right now, and I wish they would not. If we can get into the Committee of the Whole, I will take it up in good time.

I now yield 10 minutes to the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I fervently hope that there will not intervene in the consideration of this resolution making in order H. R. 331 any factor or factors that are not directly related.

Alaska has been waiting for statehood for many, many years. The people of Alaska come before the House of Representatives today seeking the enactment of H. R. 331, the Alaska statehood bill, so that they may have all the privileges of American citizenship and so that Alaska may go forward, so that its advancement may contribute to the well-being of the Nation.

It was in 1867 that Alaska was purchased from Russia by the United States. That was 83 years ago. Until 1884 we had no form of government in Alaska at all. In 1884 Congress enacted the first legislation dealing with the civil government in Alaska, but gave us very limited powers. It was not until 1900 that further steps were taken. It was not until 1906 that the Congress permitted Alaskans to send a Delegate to Congress, and it was not until 1912 that the Congress passed, and President Taft approved, an organic act for Alaska.

The question of whether Alaska should have statehood was settled in 1912. Then the Territory was formally incorporated as a Territory of the United States. The Congress said by passage of that organic act that Alaska should become a State of this Union and that thereafter it must serve only a sufficient period of tutelage to come into the Union under the proper auspices.

We now contend that that time has arrived; in fact, it arrived some years ago. We submit that under the organic act, which gave to the Territory fewer privileges of home rule than any other Territory in the history of the United States has had, we cannot progress much further. We can make the kind of progress our resources entitle us to only by becoming a State of this Union.

It has been argued that Alaska is not contiguous to any other State of the Union. Neither was California when California was admitted. We are closer to Washington, D. C., today by air travel than Washington was to Philadelphia not too long ago. A Member of this House can leave this city this afternoon and be in Alaska tomorrow. We are close. Air transportation has joined us.

During the postwar period many newcomers have gone to Alaska to settle. These are made up principally, I think, of younger people, and especially veterans. They are in the forefront of those demanding statehood. They do not like to be taxed without representation in the Congress. They do not like to be bound by national laws without having any voice in the making of those laws. Today they have only a nonvoting Delegate in the House of Representatives, but all the Federal income taxes that apply to American citizens in the continental area apply to Alaskans, and so do all other national laws.

Americans do not like that kind of a situation to continue for too long, wherever they may be. They want a voice in the making of their laws. They want to be real Americans, complete Americans, not halfway Americans as the Alaskans are today.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. From my viewpoint, the greatest discrimination I have ever known to be practiced against any people under the American flag is that now practiced against the people of Alaska in denying to them the right to fish in their own waters.

The fish taken out of Alaskan waters every year bring more money than the cotton crop of Louisiana or the wheat crop of Ohio, yet the Department of the Interior has sold to the big canning corporations the right to put their traps across the mouths of those streams that come out of Alaska, in which the salmon are spawned, and deny to the people of that country the right to fish for a living.

They will not allow those traps in British Columbia. You can go along the coast of British Columbia and see thousands of little fishermen out fishing for a living. You can see the same thing along the Gulf Coast of Mississippi. But when you go to Alaska, you find those people have been driven from the fishing grounds, and the fishing grounds have been turned over to certain monopolies.

I think that is one of the greatest injustices I have ever known. I am speaking by the cards, because I was on the Committee on Territories for 18 years and I went to Alaska one time and investigated this very question.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the gentleman for his observation. That is one of the discriminations that we are suffering under.

Mr. REDDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. REDDEN. Along the line of what the gentleman from Mississippi said, at these hearings the principal objectors to statehood for Alaska were among the very ones who were the beneficiaries of that unjustifiable lease.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is one of the discriminations that we suffer. In the Territory of Alaska we have no authority over the fishery. The Congress expressly reserved it to the administration with respect to our fisheries.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman knows I favor statehood for Alaska. I want that to get in the RECORD. Does the bill, as drawn, impose any restrictions or unwarranted conditions upon the new State which we hope to see born?

Mr. BARTLETT. In my view, no. I should add that in the committee the only controversy which arose was as to the amount of land which ought to be granted to the new State. Some Members thought we ought to have more than the four sections for every township which the bill contains. In a way, I did, too. But I felt that in some of the Eastern States, and in the executive department of the Government there might be opposition to that. I know that we can support statehood adequately with four sections.

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VURSELL. I am asking the gentleman for information. What is, let us say, the registered voting population of Alaska, and what is the general population?

Mr. BARTLETT. As I recall it, the voting population of Alaska in 1948 was in the neighborhood of 21,000 persons. In 1939 the population of Alaska was about 72,000 people, at that time divided half between the natives—Indians, Eskimos, and Aleuts on the one hand—and whites on the other. Today we estimate the population as being somewhere between 110,000 and 125,000.

Mr. VURSELL. And your legal voters number about 21,000?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the number that voted in 1948. The increase in population which, percentagewise, has been startling and would be even greater under statehood, I submit, has been on the part of the white people. The white population has moved in and has accounted for the gain in population in the last 10 years.

Mr. VURSELL. In other words, if Alaska was admitted as a State, you would have one Congressman and two Senators?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes. In the early days of the Republic every Senator represented an average of 13,000 people.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. What was the population of most of the States when they came into the Union? I wonder if the gentleman might have some figures on that.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do have some figures on that. I find that Alaska today has a population greater than six of the last Territories admitted. For example, its population is larger than the populations of Nevada, Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Missouri, Arkansas, Florida, California, Oregon, Idaho, and Wyoming when they came into the Union. So, from the standpoint of population I submit that we are eminently well qualified.

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield.

Mr. COUDERT. Is it quite clear that the figures the gentleman has just given relate to the populations at the time, many years ago, when those present States were first admitted to the Union?

Mr. BARTLETT. To the best of my belief.

Mr. COUDERT. Will the gentleman tell us, if he can, what proportion of the present American population of Alaska consists of Government employees?

Mr. BARTLETT. I should be able to give that figure off-hand because a study was made last year. As I recall it, and I do not want to be too positive about this, the figure is somewhere in the neighborhood of 4,000.

Mr. COUDERT. That represents what percentage of the total American population, as opposed to the native population?

Mr. BARTLETT. That would be about one-eighteenth of the population.

Mr. COUDERT. The gentleman stated that the voting population, the actual votes cast in 1948, were in the neighborhood of 21,000?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. COUDERT. When was the referendum upon which the gentleman relies in asking for a grant of statehood taken?

Mr. BARTLETT. In 1946.

Mr. COUDERT. Does the gentleman recall what the voting population that year was?

Mr. BARTLETT. I cannot say, but again, without any pretense of absolute accuracy, it was around 16,000 or 17,000.

Mr. COUDERT. So it is stated in the committee report. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. COUDERT. I gather from the committee report that the vote on statehood was decided in the ratio of 3 to 2, in favor. Does that mean that something like 10,000 people voted for statehood, and that is all, and that you are on the floor today because 10,000 individuals in Alaska asked for statehood?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is correct. I submit that when Americans have reached the old standard of 60,000, which has been followed, with only one exception, when statehood was asked by other and previous Territories and when they say they can support a State, they ought to have it. I think a 3 to 2 vote is a pretty heavy plurality.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. After all, we operate down here under the democratic procedure of majority rule. I would like to say for the benefit of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COUDERT] that insofar as Federal employees are concerned there are a great many natives as well as whites employed by the Federal Government.

One thing more: I think you are to be complimented for the fine work you have been doing in behalf of statehood for Alaska since you have been here. One way to break the monopolistic stranglehold which some of these fishing companies and other companies have on the Territory is to see that Alaska becomes a State and is given two United States Senators and one Representative so that they can have a voice in our Government.

The SPEAKER. The time of the Delegate from Alaska has expired.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me to permit a comment on the remark made by the gentleman from Montana?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COUDERT. The gentleman from Montana says we operate here by majority rule. I wonder if it is by majority rule that this resolution is before the House now, rather than another bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Florida, has answered that question already.

Mr KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inqury?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I have asked the gentleman to yield for the purpose of propounding a parliamentary inquiry.

After this bill is disposed of, will there be opportunity to consider any other bills today under the 21-day rule?

The SPEAKER. That problem is not within the sight of the Speaker as yet.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes from my time.

First, I want to ask the gentleman when Alaska became an American Territory.

Mr. BARTLETT. In 1867; 83 years ago.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Have you any figures to indicate the age of the oldest people in Alaska, and what age they are at the present time?

Mr. BARTLETT. Of course, the native people have been in Alaska all of their lives.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I want to establish some American citizenship here. It has been American Territory for more than 80 years. Is that correct?

Mr. BARTLETT. I will say to the gentleman that the postmistress at Juneau, Mrs. Crystal Lyow Jenne, who confesses to being around 60 years old, was born right there. Many other white persons have lived in Alaska all their lives.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And whether she is an Indian or an Aleut or a white person, or what not, is she an American citizen?

Mr. BARTLETT. She is an American citizen.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then she has the same rights as I have, has she not?

Mr. BARTLETT. She ought to have, but under Territorial government——

Mr. CRAWFORD. She ought to, and that is the point I want to make, because there has been the thought injected that simply because there are some people up there who do not happen to have Caucasian blood in their veins they are not Americans. I take the position that it is about time the Members of this body recognized that all of the people who are citizens of the United States have a few rights. Those citizens are superior citizens.

Let me ask the gentleman another question: Does the gentleman know of any citizen in my district or any other district represented here who does not vote?

Mr. BARTLETT. I think they all have the privilege of voting.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But the gentleman knows that throughout all our districts there are millions of people who do not vote, and the same probably applies in Alaska.

Mr. BARTLETT. As to our 21,000 voting population compared to our total population, it is very favorable by comparison to the United States as a whole.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Of course it is; it compares favorably with the voting record in my district. We do not want to slip here and leave the idea that the people of Alaska are not citizens of the United States. They are entitled to some rights.

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield.

Mr. D'EWART. I wish to follow a little further the line of interrogation initiated by the gentleman from Michigan. I understand that just before the last Secretary of the Interior resigned he set up two more Indian reservations in Alaska. I have two questions: Does that not tie up a large section of Alaska's economy? And, second, does not that put those citizens who live within those Indian reservations in the status of wards rather than people of equal citizenship as the others?

Mr. BARTLETT. The Interior Department says not. But further answering the gentleman, one reason why we are so anxious to achieve statehood without further delay is that the Federal Government is constantly withdrawing from the public domain land all over the Territory.

Mr. D'EWART. And the gentleman objects to that procedure.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think it is basically wrong.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I wish to take this opportunity to compliment the gentleman for his untiring efforts on behalf of statehood for his people. I wish to make the observation in connection with the number of people in Alaska who vote, that it should be said that some of those people have to travel hundreds of miles in order to cast their ballots. I think it is an excellent showing when some 20,000 people cast ballots in a general election in one of the most remote areas on the North American Continent.

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield.

Mr. HUBER. We gave statehood to California and Texas. They now assert that the oil deposits belong to the State. Is it possible that were statehood given to Alaska she would claim jurisdiction of the fisheries?

Mr. BARTLETT. Fisheries, of course, are under the jurisdiction of the several States. That was settled long ago.

The SPEAKER. The time of the Delegate from Alaska has again expired.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the Delegate from Alaska two additional minutes.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to commend the Delegate from Alaska for his several years of faithful service in the House and for these many years he has served so diligently, yet without the right to cast a vote. I sincerely trust that the House will approve the rule. Let me make the comment that during the recess a few of us had the opportunity of visiting Anchorage, Alaska. We talked with our military leaders; we talked with businessmen in Anchorage, and we found them united in their interest in this legislation which is characteristic of the people throughout Alaska. We found the people faithful, honest, and sincere in asking the Congress to follow through on this long-promised legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am grateful for the gentleman's observation.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I wish to compliment the Delegate from Alaska on the great work he has done for the people of Alaska and to say that I and the people of West Virginia are happy to support this bill.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I wish to commend the Delegate from Alaska, Mr. Speaker, for his work on behalf of Alaska statehood. I, too, recently went to Alaska and found the people of the Territory anxious for statehood. As a relative of Wickersham, who was Delegate from Alaska, I would be most happy should his wish, as well as mine, be fulfilled.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the gentleman. There is a certain affinity between Alaska and California because just 100 years ago the same arguments that are being made on the floor of this House against the admission of Alaska were made against the admission of California to the Union. We were far more remote in those days than Alaska is at the present time. I am very hopeful we will see the culmination of statehood for Alaska come out of this session of Congress.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. JENSEN. It is important in this instance to have the record show that there is absolutely no political tinge to this issue. While the gentleman is of the majority party, he has been very active and very cooperative with the Members on this side of the aisle. He and I have cooperated 100 percent.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, and the gentleman has assisted Alaska greatly, may I say.

Mr. JENSEN. There was a time not long ago when I felt it was not advisable to give Alaska statehood; but under present conditions with Alaska situated as it is in this defense program that we have, and the situation in which we find ourselves today, I believe the Congress should show the people of Alaska that they want them to have the same privileges as the people do on the mainland of the United States because certainly they are patriotic people and they do deserve this recognition.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alaska has expired.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LESINSKI] for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, since the Speaker has recognized the chairman of a standing committee, although I hoped I would be recognized, may I say that on tomorrow, Tuesday, the Rules Committee will have a meeting. Knowing that certain members of the Democratic Party are against FEPC, I wonder if the leadership of the Republican Party is sincere in the statements that it has made that it is for FEPC, and would it instruct its members on the Rules Committee to vote the rule out tomorrow?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Obviously a quorum is not present.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 14]

Barrett, Pa.	Elliott	Rich
Bland	Gilmer	Sasscer
Blatnik	Hébert	Shafer
Boggs, La.	Hobbs	Simpson, Pa.
Bolling	Johnson	Smathers
Bonner	Kilburn	Smith, Ohio
Boykin	Kruse	Staggers
Bulwinkle	LeFevre	Stigler
Burdick	Lemke	Stockman
Byrne, N. Y.	Mack, Wash.	Tackett
Celler	Martin, Mass.	Underwood
Chatham	Miles	Wadsworth
Crosser	Morton	Walsh
Curtis	Murphy	Willis
Davies, N. Y.	Noland	Withrow
Davis, Tenn.	Pace	Zablocki
Dawson	Rains

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 381 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

ADMISSION OF ALASKA TO THE UNION

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Speaker, on great issues such as we now have before us, I feel that the opposition should be permitted to present its case. I have said to the Members on this side of the aisle who oppose this measure that I would try and give them some time. At this moment, therefore, Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COUDERT].

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, I certainly would have been surprised and incredulous if somebody had told me this morning that when I arrived at the Capitol I should find myself discussing this bill rather than the bill which we had all come to act upon and which we had every reason to expect would be before us. I was reluctant to take time that might have postponed consideration of that bill which must ultimately reach the House, which everybody is waiting to act on.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COUDERT. Later, not now.

Mr. Speaker, the only reason that impels me to speak at this time is a sense of duty inspired largely by the remarks of the distinguished gentleman who occupies the chair. Three years ago a similar bill was on the calendar of the House. I think it was during a 1-minute speech that I had occasion to read Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler's letter objecting to statehood for Hawaii and Alaska. When I got through the then minority leader, now the distinguished Speaker of this House, rose in his place, and these are the remarks that he made; remarks, I submit, that could not be more pertinent to the present situation. Hear me now for a moment. I am quoting. Mr. RAYBURN, after stating that this was a very interesting and important question, concluded:

> I want to say that I think this goes to the fundamentals, and the question we have to ask is whether we are going to begin making States out of possessions not contiguous to the United States of America.

Now, hear this. Mr. RAYBURN is still speaking:

> I think it is a deep, fundamental question that we will have to meet one day, and we had better put our best thinking on it.

Mr. Speaker, is this the way to put our best thinking on this? This is a bill of which we have had no advance notice, it does not appear in any notice, no one had any reason to expect consideration of the matter today. This bill is up here solely for the purpose of preventing consideration of another bill. Is that the way to give a bill our best thinking?

My confidence in the judgment of the Speaker when he was minority leader is such that I think this rule should be defeated. The problem should be put over until such time as we have given due notice to the membership so that it may have the opportunity to give the matter its best thinking, not merely use this bill as an excuse for not doing something else.

I have another reason that I think is a good one for postponing consideration of this matter, and therefore to beat the rule at this time. It is fundamental, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] stated.

Some time ago I offered a constitutional amendment, which is now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary, to deal with the one great objection, the one insuperable objection to the admission of these small outlying areas with tiny populations. That is an amendment which would permit the Congress of the United States in admitting new States to prescribe that such States shall have one or no or two Senators. After all, the chief objection to this, is that admission of one of these areas means necessarily the admission of two or three or a large addition to the number of Senators in the Senate of the United States, a further violent addition to the already shocking distortion in representation in the Senate of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. FARRINGTON].

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise for two purposes, first to say that I am emphatically and completely in favor of the admission of Alaska to the Union of the States. I believe that the admission of both Alaska and Hawaii at the present time is imperative so that the people of the Pacific area will know that the United States is not retreating from the position it won at great sacrifice during the recent war. If you will take into consideration all the factors that enter into the question of statehood for Alaska and Hawaii, I am sure you will not have any hesitation about the vote you will cast.

I am also interested in the admission of Hawaii into the Union, as I said. I have no argument on the question of procedure. I am perfectly willing to accept the decision of the leadership of the House on that. I discussed this question with the majority leader as far back as 3 months ago and he informed me it was his purpose to bring both measures to the floor of the House, but that he would bring up the Alaska bill first. I said that if he would then bring up the Hawaii bill it would be agreeable to me. Inasmuch as many Republicans have inquired about parliamentary position, of this legislation, I am going to ask the majority leader to inform the House at the present time what he plans to do.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman has quoted me absolutely correctly. I said to the gentleman further back than 3 months ago, and on various occasions, that I think both of these bills should come up one after the other. I frankly told him I thought Alaska should come up first. That is the gentleman's agreement that I made with the distinguished Delegate from Hawaii, and if anyone had asked me the question, I would have told them the same thing.

Insofar as I am able to keep my agreement, I intend to do so. I hope the House will enable me to carry out an agreement that I think is fair, an agreement that I think is just, and an agreement that I think is honest. Both great political parties in their platforms have come out emphatically in favor of the admission of Alaska and Hawaii as States of the Union. I intend to keep my word. Of course, the House is supreme, and I am but a servant of the House. I will keep my word unless the House insists otherwise. If this rule is adopted today, which I hope it will be, I also have a hope that the other rule might be adopted, but if not, it is my intention not to bring the consideration of the Alaska bill up until the Hawaii rule is adopted. That is my intention. Now, I am just an individual, but I have made an agreement, and my agreement means something to me. I think it is the fair thing to do, and I think the proponents of both bills ought to recognize from a practical angle as to their mutual advantage to have the House know of both coming up one after the other, and to have a situation exist where this can be done.

Mr. FARRINGTON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman from Massachusetts has said that he insisted on the Alaska bill coming up first. I wonder if he could tell us why he was so insistent about that.

Mr. McCORMACK. Certainly, I do not want Hawaii to go through and have Alaska defeated, or have Alaska encounter difficulty. We are all practical men. You cannot object to my doing that. I am keeping my word with the gentleman. I have said that both should come up with Alaska, in my opinion, coming up first. Alaska is a good Democratic Territory and Hawaii is Republican. Let us be frank about that. Does the gentleman object to that?

Mr. HALLECK. Certainly not. The gentleman realizes that on most serious cases we can yet enjoy a little good humor.

Mr. McCORMACK. You bet.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I would just like to remark that being a great follower of the titular head of my party and the believer in unity that I am, I am pleased to say that there is a great unanimity of feeling in this House that both the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Indiana are very practical men.

Mr. McCORMACK. Coming from the most practical Republican in the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], that is, indeed, flattering to both the gentleman from Indiana and myself.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. I am sure we admire the gentleman from Massachusetts for keeping his word with the distinguished gentleman from Hawaii in calling this bill up first. I did not know that he had taken the responsibility for recognizing the gentleman from Florida for calling this bill up. Now I wonder if he is going to keep faith with the gentleman from Michigan, or I wonder if he had any such agreement with the gentleman from Michigan that this bill would be called up before his bill, the FEPC.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman, of course, cannot, in the mind of any Member of the House, make that statement and make any impression upon them. The fact is that the Speaker, in the exercise of his judgment, has recognized the gentleman from Florida. The fact is that I find myself, in connection with the distinguished Delegate from Hawaii, in a position where I have a word involved, and so far as I am personally concerned, I am going to keep the word that I give to any Member of the House insofar as I am able to do so. I have said to the distinguished Delegate from Hawaii repeatedly, and now I am going to say it publicly, and I am glad to state it now so that it will be understood, that I had a gentleman's agreement with him that both bills should be brought up one after the other, and insofar as I am able, I intend to keep my agreement, and I hope the House will permit me to do so.

Mr. FARRINGTON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time in order that I might have an opportunity to discuss for a moment the query of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LESINSKI] made on the floor a few minutes ago as to what the Republican members of the Committee on Rules might or might not do tomorrow if given an opportunity to express themselves when the Rules Committee convenes, if it does convene.

I have served a long, long time in political office. I have seen and heard many, many strange things, but I have never in all my life, and I say this with all the friendship in the world for the gentleman from Michigan, seen a man display the unmitigated gall that he has displayed here today when, after voting on Friday to take away from the Rules Committee all of its power and discretion, or practically so, he comes here and asks what the four members of the minority party on the Rules Committee are going to do to take him off the spot.

Let me say to the gentleman from Michigan for his enlightenment and, if possible, for his information, that in the Seventy-ninth Congress the four Republican members of the Rules Committee did vote to report FEPC legislation, and only two out of eight of his party voted to report it. Still the gentleman has the effrontery to stand here on the floor of the House and attempt to mislead us and the country into thinking the Republicans can control future action on this legislation which he failed to call up here today.

I want to remind him, and I want to remind every Member of the House, and I hope that the press will be listening in, that the gentleman from Michigan had the opportunity to call this civil-rights legislation up, which he tried so hard to get considered here today, day after day all through the last session of Congress, from August 22 on, to have the FEPC bill considered and voted on in the House.

No, you cannot shift the responsibility, you must accept it. The time must come when the minority groups of this country, whom the gentleman and some other members of his party have been kidding along, will learn the truth and know the truth.

I have just read the press reports from down at the White House. I understand that the Representatives of the gentleman's Democratic Party, the leadership of this House, when they came out of the White House today and were interviewed by the press, one of them, when asked what was decided about FEPC, made the statement, "Why, the President didn't even mention FEPC."

When your President, who pledged himself to this legislation, and your party leaders, the spokesmen of your party which is in power, failed to even discuss this legislation, do not try to pass the buck to somebody else. You cannot get away with it.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman has spoken of the action of certain members of the Rules Committee in the Seventy-ninth Congress. I was at that time a member of the Rules Committee. I voted to send the measure to the floor for consideration.

The so-called parliamentary inquiry by the gentleman from Michigan, I am quite sure he well knew, was no parliamentary inquiry at all, and, of course, under the circumstances no response could be made, but certainly anyone with eyes to see and ears to hear can understand that, just as the gentleman from Ohio has said, the gentleman from Michigan is engaged in some sort of a frantic endeavor to extricate himself and his associates from the dilemma in which they presently find themselves.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. No; I have already heard enough from you today. I am sure the gentleman can make no worth-while contribution to this debate.

Mr. Speaker, let me conclude by saying that the gentleman from Michigan and his cohorts decided to adopt the 21-day rule policy as their method of parliamentary procedure on civil-rights legislation. You control the chair and you control a great majority of the votes in this House. You proved that last Friday. Why do you not go ahead and use this 21-day rule which you adopted? Why do you not proceed under it, and why do you not get the action that you promised these minority groups you would get for them? Can it be that your heart is not in it, sir?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LESINSKI] does not need any defense from me or anyone else. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] is an expert at criticizing and unfortunately for him, perhaps it is due to his age, he misstates facts. I do not think, however, that he does so willfully or deliberately. I would not charge him with that.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] states that in the Seventy-ninth Congress the Republicans voted to report a rule on the Federal Fair Employment Practice Act. As a member of the Committee on Rules at that time, and as its chairman, I recollect that I tried my very best to obtain a rule on FEPC making in order its consideration. I recall how vehemently President Roosevelt urged and advocated that we grant a rule, but regrettably, I never could obtain a majority of the Committee on Rules to so vote. The four Republican members of the Committee on Rules, including the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], whenever they had an opportunity, be it on one pretense or another, would demand postponement, delay, or a continuance of consideration on FEPC and they invariably succeeded in forcing a delay notwithstanding the fact that on several occasions it was positively set for a vote. I recall further, that the last time the fair-employment-practice bill was scheduled for consideration in the Seventy-ninth Congress, one gentleman opposed to the rule was absent. Had the Republicans been ready to vote on that occasion we would have had six votes in favor of a rule on FEPC, and five against. But again, because one member was opposed to it, as I said previously, the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Slaughter, who on the pretext of bad flying weather could not be present, these same Republicans insisted that he should be given a chance to express his vote, thus delaying the vote until he arrived in Washington knowing full well that his negative vote would be the tie vote. Consequently, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] cannot maintain or claim that they voted for the rule in the Seventy-ninth Congress under these circumstances; yes, they promised many times that they would vote for a rule on FEPC, but thus far they have failed miserably to keep their promise. These Republican members of the Committee on Rules will be given another opportunity tomorrow to vote in favor of a rule thereon. Even if three of the four Republicans vote for a rule, I feel that I will be able to report the rule.

The facts are that last Thursday when I endeavored to obtain a vote on FEPC, the Republican members of the committee insisted that we owe it to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] to let the matter go over until Tuesday—tomorrow—for a vote owing to the absence of the latter gentleman. It was in deference to these two gentlemen that I postponed action until tomorrow. Tomorrow I will demand a vote regardless.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] makes the statement that the President has not said anything to indicate his interest in the FEPC measure. I did not understand whether he was alluding to the President's press conference today or to the last time that I saw the President. Nevertheless, I want to inform the gentleman from Ohio that, regardless of what statements were made by the press, not only has President Truman urged and advocated favorable action on the FEPC bill, but he assured me that he was doing everything humanly possible to defeat the Cox resolution which would have, had it passed, killed the Lesinski discharge rule and many others. In addition, both the Democratic and Republican Party platforms contain planks supporting this FEPC measure in unmistakable language.

I assure the gentleman from Ohio, the House, and the country that I shall call up the FEPC bill tomorrow morning for consideration before my committee, regardless of statements made by anyone at any time, and I shall force a vote thereon.

Tomorrow's vote will tell the real story.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I would like to make the observation that so far as President Truman is concerned, everybody knows his position on the FEPC, and the attempt of my friend from Ohio to discolor it because nothing was mentioned at the leaders' conference this morning about it is clearly understood by every intelligent person.

Mr. SABATH. You ought to understand, sir, that the gentleman from Ohio is an expert in misstating facts, unfortunately, when he believes there is something to be gained politically by his side.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield, for a question.

Mr. COLMER. I want to clarify one matter. Did I understand the gentleman to say that it was agreed in the Committee on Rules last week that the two gentlemen who were absent would vote to report the rule out?

Mr. SABATH. It has been stated by the gentlemen who were present at our last meeting that, although they were not binding the two members who were absent, if the matter would be put over until tomorrow—Tuesday—they will be ready to vote on the rule.

Mr. COLMER. I just want to say to the gentleman I was present and I heard no such statement made in the committee.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] never hears anything that he does not conveniently want to hear. Nevertheless, the above statement was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] that if the matter goes over until Tuesday, they will be ready to vote on Tuesday. Regardless of what the gentlemen from Mississippi, Illinois, or Ohio might say, I call upon the 25 or 30 members of the press who were present at the meeting to substantiate my statement.

I repeat, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] that they voted for FEPC in the Seventy-ninth Congress, I do not see how they can refuse to vote for it tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that we need look much farther to see that this House of Representatives is in a very chaotic condition. We have the chairman of the Committee on Rules saying that they have an agreement about bringing out a rule tomorrow. That was not my understanding.

Mr. SABATH. Did you not say we will vote Tuesday if we will let the thing go over until Tuesday?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I distinctly did not, and the record in your own office will prove that, if you will look at the motion I made. The motion was that FEPC could not come up until next Tuesday, not that it was to come up.

Mr. SABATH. I am amazed.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Another thing, Mr. Speaker, I came to Congress in 1933, and at that time we heard the late President of the United States (Mr. Roosevelt) say a great deal about taking care of civil rights for certain minority groups. We know that was 16 years ago and you heard that at that time. We all know that Congress after Congress, after Mr. Roosevelt came in, would do his bidding with the slightest nod. They closed the banks in 5 minutes; but still the buncombe goes on, after 16 years of the New Deal, promising civil rights, and we still do not have it. Why do we not have it? You can say what you want about the Republican Party, but the fact is that the Democrats have controlled this Nation for 16 years. If they are standing sincerely for civil rights, why kid these minority people further?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANSFIELD. What is the subject under discussion? We are supposed to be taking time to discuss the matter of Alaskan statehood. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Debates of this kind take a wide range. Members may speak out of order unless a point of order is made against their speaking out of order and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. REDDEN].

Mr. REDDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to say it is perfectly apparent that the overwhelmingly majority of the Republicans and the overwhelming majority of the Democrats who live north of Mason and Dixon's line want FEPC brought up, but the boys down South just will not allow it, and we will take that responsibility.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO].

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I think it is obvious to everybody in this House, and to the whole country, in light of the events that have taken place today, that everybody wants civil rights as an issue but not as a law. That goes for Harry Truman, the Democratic Party, and the Republican Party.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, if I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], he said there was some agreement or some statement in the Rules Committee undertaking to pledge two members who were unavoidably absent at the time of the meeting of the committee, not only that they would vote on the resolution but would vote for it. Knowing those two gentlemen, that seems rather inconceivable to me. In view of the issue that has been raised, I wonder if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] still insists that such a statement was made.

Mr. SABATH. I will leave it to the 30 members of the press who were present at the open meeting when this statement was made, that if the matter will go over until Tuesday that they will vote on the question and vote for the rule.

Mr. HALLECK. But vote on the question is an entirely different matter from someone making the statement to the effect that not only would they vote on the matter but would vote for the matter. That is the point that I think should be clarified.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield.

Mr. COX. No such statement was made, as made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] in the Rules Committee.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of the time.

Mr. Speaker, we have before us at this time a rule on H. R. 331, a bill to provide for the admission of Alaska into the Union. This proposal was reported to the House by the Public Lands Committee, report 255, on March 10, 1949. As far as I know, by far the majority of the Committee on Public Lands is very much in favor of the adoption of this rule and the passage of the bill.

I wish to say to the Members of the House that, insofar as my position is concerned, I am positively in favor of adopting the rule and the bill making Alaska a State of the Union, as well as the adoption of the rule and the bill on the proposal to make Hawaii a State of the Union. The two issues have been before this country for several years; and, certainly, during the past 24 months. It is my understanding, both major political parties have wholeheartedly endorsed the bringing in of Alaska and Hawaii as States in the Union. Certainly polls which have been conducted by the various newspapers in the congressional districts throughout the United States have shown an overwhelmingly opinion in this country in favor of making these two areas States of the Union.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that now is as good a time as we shall ever have for the House to indicate its opinion on these two issues and I sincerely hope that this particular rule now before the House will be adopted.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, formerly I was a member of the Committee on Territories before the Reorganization Act went into effect. As a member of that committee I made an extensive trip over Alaska. I went to Alaska another year with the committee, giving this question very, very careful consideration. We reached the conclusion that Alaska certainly was entitled to statehood, and I am still of that opinion. I believe that we have too long delayed admitting into the Union both Alaska and the Hawaiian Islands. They have the population; they have the industry; they have the intelligence; certainly, they have the right; and it is to the best interest not alone of te Territories but also to the interest of all of the United States that these two Territories be admitted to statehood.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish for the time being to get away from the FEPC bill and back on to the rule which we are considering. This is a vital question, and from the foreign policy point of view, Alaska is one of our stout bastions. I think that Congress would be helping to strengthen the defense of America and strengthen the people of Alaska as being part of this country if we were to adopt this rule at this time.

As a newspaperman I attended the Speaker's press conference this morning and heard the statement made that the Rules Committee was going to meet at an early date to consider and report on FEPC.

I heard the further statement made that this was not the time for a fight. This means that now is not the time for FEPC. I can hardly feel that this is a correct estimation of how the Congress feels about this issue, because some of us got up at 3:30 this morning to make a 5 o'clock plane to get here to vote on FEPC.

Mr. Speaker, when this rule on the bill admitting Alaska to statehood came up, it was a great shock to many of the people who felt that now was the time that everyone in this Congress should be given a free right to express his position definitely on FEPC.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have the privilege of extending their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, Americans generally realize the wisdom of statehood for Alaska. Both political parties in their platforms have urged that statehood be granted to both Alaska and Hawaii.

With the Soviet Union threatening the peace of the world as an aggressor nation, the fact that Alaska is but a few miles from Soviet territory and only minutes away as war planes travel is an important argument for the admission of Alaska into statehood now.

Very thorough plans should be made to rebuild Alaskan defenses and to man World War II air bases in Alaska by additional ground forces. In fact, admission of Alaska to statehood will serve notice upon the Communists of Russia that we realize the importance of Alaska in the defense of this Nation against dictatorship aggression, and that we propose to build our defenses in Alaska to a strength sufficient to repel any attack from the Soviet Union and that this forty-ninth State will no longer be a vulnerable spot for the defense of the United States.

To the argument that admission of Alaska to statehood would give two votes in the United States Senate for a population of somewhat more than one hundred thousand, those of us who favor immediate admission of this frontier territory assert that a glance back over the years will demonstrate that some of our greatest Senators have come from States of small populations. One example would be Senator Norris, of Nebraska. A present example would be Senator JOSEPH O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming. Truly, one cannot say that the votes of Senators from States such as Ohio have been more noticeably in the Nation's interest than have those from Nebraska, Nevada, Colorado, and other States of small populations.

It is my earnest hope that during the present session of this Congress both branches of this Congress will vote affirmatively for admission of Alaska and Hawaii as States in the Union.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Pacific Ocean will in future be the ocean of commerce, just as the Atlantic Ocean in the past has been the ocean of commerce, I have felt that both Alaska and Hawaii should be admitted to statehood. As has been pointed out, both occupy a position of great strategic importance, which fact I recognize as significant in our national defense. Therefore, I favor statehood for both possessions because of their significance in national defense and global security and as stepping stones in global commerce and trade with all other nations.

In the Public Lands Committee, when we considered the two statehood bills, I had little to say, but I thought a great deal about a number of matters connected therewith. I recall that when Delegate FARRINGTON called attention to the fact that Hawaii had knocked on the door of the Union for a half century, I sympathized with him and explained that Arizona Territory knocked on the door of the Union for about the same length of time before her admission. When statehood for Alaska was considered and it seemed that powerful and selfish interests operating in and exploiting Alaska were opposing admission, I explained to Delegate BARTLETT that the same occurred when Arizona asked for admission as a State. And to both Delegate BARTLETT and Delegate FARRINGTON I expressed a hope that when their respective territories were admitted as States that there would be no onerous or crippling conditions imposed as the price of admission as had been imposed upon the forty-eighth State to be admitted.

I have often praised the wisdom and the justice of the founding fathers who in two memorable documents of 1787 encouraged the formation of new States out west and facilitated the settlements of new commonwealths and planned that they should attain statehood on terms of equality with the Original Thirteen States. Of course, I refer to the ordinance of 1787 covering the Northwest Territory and the present Constitution of the United States. The spirit of these two basic instruments is both wise and generous, but I am sorry to say the same generosity has not been evident always in the carrying out of that philosophy. Too often the admission of a Territory to statehood has been made a football of politics. Almost every new State admitted has had a part to play in partisan politics, and political considerations have sometimes clouded the merits of the bid for statehood.

When Missouri asked for admission into the Union as a State, she was admitted with a condition. Many leaders in Missouri raised a constitutional question then as to whether Congress had a right to impose a condition of admission and contended that if any condition were imposed on a new State the State thus admitted would not be on terms of equality with the other States according to the Constitution. Therefore, as a student of history and now a Member of Congress, I am always interested in whether anyone seeks to impose any condition upon a Federal Territory making application for statehood. I suppose there may be good conditions or bad conditions imposed. It depends upon whether wise statesmanship imposes the condition or selfish interests seek to impose some unwise condition in their own favor.

A significant fact in the admission of Arizona Territory, which has a very vital bearing on the future on the youngest State, is this: That by the enabling act of June 20, 1910, in which Congress authorized statehood for Arizona, there was a condition imposed upon the new State whereby a strip of land 6 miles wide along the Colorado River within Arizona was withdrawn by the Federal Government. The Constitution of Arizona recognized this power of withdrawal and confirmed it. The land was withdrawn, thus making it impossible for anyone in Arizona to obtain water or power from the Colorado River without the consent of Congress, although the Colorado River flows for more than 300 miles within and across the State of Arizona. For these benefits, Arizona absolutely depends upon the consent and authorization of Congress. Saying nothing about the wisdom or lack of wisdom which prompted the imposing of this condition, it is a significant legal fact not very generally understood even by the people of Arizona. In other words, something written into basic law before Arizona became a State now makes Arizona absolutely dependent upon the Federal Government for obtaining any benefits from the Colorado River, which is her greatest natural resource.

It pleased me greatly to hear Delegate BARTLETT say earlier today that he did not feel that any bad conditions had thus far been imposed upon Alaska. He has put up a good fight for statehood, and I hope he succeeds without any unwise restriction.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, the debate this afternoon has wandered far afield; but as I stated in my opening talk the purpose of this resolution is to make in order consideration of the bill granting statehood to Alaska, a bill which has had the approval of both of the major political parties, a bill upon which extensive hearings have been held by the committee. The bill came out with practically the unanimous approval of the committee. Alaska is an area with more population and of greater economic worth than many of our States. I feel the same way so far as Hawaii is concerned. I acted in good faith in calling up this bill and trying to carry out the directions of my committee.

Let us not lose sight of the fact that there has not been any effort to crowd anybody else out. This is simply an effort to comply with the rules of the House in an effort to get the rule brought to the floor in an orderly procedure. This was the only recourse left to me. The Members asked me to bring the matter up.

I hope the Members will vote favorably on the resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CORBETT. What would be the order of business in the event this rule is defeated?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question because he does not know at this time who will rise seeking recognition.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEATING. In the event that the Chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LESINSKI], sought recognition, if this rule were defeated, could the Speaker tell us what would be the order of business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will attend to that matter when he reaches it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under the rule under which we are proceeding only one motion to adjourn is permissible. That motion was offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] after the resolution was called up. I therefore make the point of order that a motion to adjourn is not in order at this time.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair remembers correctly, the motion to adjourn was made before the resolution was called up.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I do not want to disagree with the Speaker, but I think he is mistaken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will refer to the record.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. It was after the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PETERSON] had been recognized and the resolution had been called up.

The SPEAKER. The Chair distinctly remembers now that the gentleman from Florida had been recognized, but the resolution had not been reported and, therefore, it was not before the House.

The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WHEELER) there were—ayes 78, noes 169.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas, 373, nays 25, not voting 33, as follows:

Mr. WILLIAMS changed his vote from "aye" to "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF HAWAII INTO THE UNION

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 2 (c) of rule 11, I call up House Resolution 218, which has remained in the Committee on Rules for more than 21 calendar days without having been reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 49) to enable the people of Hawaii to form a constitution and State government and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Public Lands, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] so that an orderly division of the time may be had and at this time I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is in about the same situation as I explained with reference to the bill involving statehood for Alaska and is a resolution which makes in order the bringing up of a bill providing for statehood for Hawaii. Many Members were on the floor a few minutes ago when there was colloquy between the Delegate from Hawaii and the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], in which it was stated that, as a matter of fairness, both bills should come up for consideration at the same time. It was stated clearly that both of them were planks in the platforms of the two major political parties.

I sought recognition to bring up this particular bill by reason of that understanding and by reason of the fact that my own committee on the same day authorized and directed me to proceed under this method in order to see that both bills were brought up.

Mr. Speaker, I may say that in the Committee on Public Lands there has been no party politics. While we have divided votes in a few instances, we have never divided along strictly party lines. All bills that have come before that committee have been carefully considered by it.

In a spirit of fairness, it is felt that the presentation we are making here under the parliamentary situation is the solution. We have previously adopted a rule making in order the Alaska bill. We are following that with a resolution making in order the bringing up of a bill providing for statehood for Hawaii.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I may say for the benefit of the Members of the House so that they will know the situation that after this rule is adopted, if it is, and I hope it is, I do not intend to program either of the bills this week. I have no knowledge now when I shall, but it will enable me to carry out an agreement I made. I appreciate the action of the Members in enabling me to keep my word with one of our distinguished delegates, but for the benefit of our Members I may say that neither of these bills will come up this week.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLMER. Do I understand correctly from the distinguished majority leader that after this rule is disposed of neither bill will be considered upon its merits today?

Mr. McCORMACK. Exactly.

Mr. COLMER. Then would the majority leader tell us what the program will be for the rest of the day?

Mr. McCORMACK. I know of no program for the rest of the day.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. What is the underlying reason for postponing the consideration of the Alaska bill, on which a rule has been adopted? Is there any special reason for it? This could wait until we dispose of the Alaska bill. We cannot pass both of them at one and the same time.

Mr. PETERSON. The distinguished majority leader has said that he told the Delegate from Hawaii that he thought as a matter of fairness one should immediately follow the other. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts to let him speak for himself.

Mr. McCORMACK. I might say to my friend from Illinois that I wanted, if possible, to have both rules adopted. With the adoption of the rules today I can program the bills later. If neither one of the rules was adopted today I could not do that. These bills will be programed. They are in both party platforms. I wanted to advise the Members of the House that insofar as this week is concerned I do not intend to program the bills, so that the Members will have the benefit of that information and they can govern themselves accordingly.

Mr. SABATH. What is on for tomorrow if, as the gentleman says, he will not call up one of these bills?

Mr. McCORMACK. Tomorrow there is no program. I made an agreement that there would be no legislative business tomorrow.

The next order of business, unless the gentleman's committee reports out some rules, will be a bill coming out of the Committee on Ways and Means relating to retroactive taxes on life-insurance companies for 1948 and 1949, and I understand a large majority of the members of both parties on the Committee on Ways and Means voted in favor of reporting this bill.

Mr. SABATH. I do not know whether or not the gentleman is aware of the fact, but the Committee on Ways and Means has not yet asked for a rule. I do not even know whether they have reported the bill. Consequently, the Committee on Rules, even if it were inclined to grant a rule on it, could not do so before the bill is reported.

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not know whether the Committee on Ways and Means will request a rule, or whether it is necessary on a tax bill. I had an idea that it had a privileged status. I do not know whether this particular bill calls for a rule or whether it has a privileged status. If it is necessary to have a rule, they are going to seek a closed rule. As far as I am concerned, I like to have as much legislation as is possible considered under the general rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself four additional minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I invite the attention of the distinguished majority leader to this, with reference to scheduling these bills for consideration. Of course, I like to cooperate with the gentleman, but the House definitely has assurance that the bill will come up later? That is correct, is it not? When we adopt this rule, it becomes a matter of privilege and the chairman can bring it up?

Mr. McCORMACK. That is a matter of recognition. There is a difference between privilege and recognition.

Mr. PETERSON. That is right. What I wanted to know was whether the House in voting for the rule would be entitled to feel that it would have a right to have the bill come up.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Florida knows that the gentleman from Massachusetts will program these bills. There is no misunderstanding about that in the gentleman's mind, is there?

Mr. PETERSON. No; that is right.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. I do this in order that I may understand definitely what is in contemplation for the balance of the day. A number of Members on our side have inquired from me about it. Some of them have engagements for the evening. As I understood the majority leader, he said that after the adoption of this rule, which probably will be some time along toward 5:30 or 6 o'clock, he has no further program. Does that mean that he contemplates moving to adjourn the House at that time?

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman's interpretation of what I intend to do is absolutely correct.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman from Massachusetts, the distinguished majority leader, replied to an inquiry of the gentleman from Mississippi regarding the program for the balance of the day. I assume that that is subject to the exception that if the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LESINSKI] should seek recognition following this matter and if the Speaker should recognize him, we would then take up the matter which he has in mind.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from New York imposes a number of if's. Of course, all these if's are possible, and that can only be determined when the time arrives when the if's must be met.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. If the gentleman wishes to speak on this particular matter. I do not want to wander too far afield and take up the time of the House. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COLMER. If I understood the distinguished majority leader correctly, he will move that the House adjourn when this rule is disposed of.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief observation?

Mr. PETERSON. If it is about this particular bill. I do not want to wander afield. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I will be very brief. I simply want to say this: The duty of every friend of FEPC is to vote down the majority leader's motion to adjourn.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from New York sometimes makes me wonder whether the tactics employed by him are consistent with the best interests of what some of us seek. The gentleman from New York is not putting me on the spot to call up anything after 5 o'clock. The gentleman himself knows what the situation is.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That is because I know the situation.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield further.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. We ought to stay here until the FEPC is voted on tonight.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, it seems as if I am destined to have the FEPC debate come up anytime I try to bring up anything else. But this is an effort, again I say in good faith, to carry out an understanding based on fairness that if one Territory has its opportunity to be heard before the elected Representatives of the people that the other would have the opportunity to be heard immediately following. This is in accord with the resolution passed by both parties and contained in their platform and is in accord with a resolution passed by the Committee on Public Lands directing the action of the chairman of that committee. For that reason I hope we will not wander into other fields and will vote for this resolution when the time comes to vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. FARRINGTON].

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to prolong this matter. I am as anxious as anyone in the House of Representatives that this question be brought to a vote. The only question, too, is whether or not the House shall debate a rule under which statehood for Hawaii can be brought before the House for consideration after it has considered statehood for Alaska. I think that is only fair. I think it is a sound method of approaching this question. I do not have to tell you that for a long period of time the people whom I have the honor to represent have looked forward to the time when they could enjoy the full privileges of American citizenship. The House has undertaken more than one investigation of our ability to discharge the responsibilities of statehood. Over a period of 10 years some six different committees have made exhaustive inquiries, and each one has come to the conclusion we have met all the requirements of statehood. We have the population, we have the wealth, and we have the ability to manage our own affairs.

I think it is in the national interest that in view of the situation that has developed, particularly in the Far East, we should admit Alaska and Hawaii to the Union as States. The least we can do this afternoon is to agree that this issue shall be brought to a vote. I want to say most earnestly that I trust you will vote in the affirmative on this rule.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARRINGTON. I yield.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I say to the Delegate from Hawaii that the people of Alaska are in favor of statehood for Hawaii. May I say further that if every Member of the House could have been in the committee room of the Committee on Public Lands when Admiral Nimitz testified in favor of statehood for Hawaii, I believe his doubts would have been resolved.

Mr. FARRINGTON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARRINGTON. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I compliment the Delegate from Hawaii for the fine work that he has done over the years in his attempt to achieve statehood for the Territory. Hawaii has had an outstanding representative in the Congress of the United States. The people of Hawaii should be congratulated for the fine work that he has done in their behalf in this movement.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARRINGTON. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I believe that all Members, despite the fact that so many of us feel chagrined and disappointed for the failure of the FEPC matter to come up are happy that this question is now before us and about to be disposed of, and we all wish Hawaii well and trust that she will get her statehood.

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON].

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, the question has now come up whether we are going to extend statehood so that we can have a strategic area which we will call the United States, even apart from the continental United States?

I think the administration and the Congress is actually prepared for it, because if you look up at the ceiling of this Chamber, you will note that the spaces for the seals are already there, and there are two extra spaces. Should I say "were," as it seems that the spaces have been filled in since I looked up at the ceiling the last time.

Mr. FARRINGTON. If you will look, you will find the coat of arms of Hawaii, with the motto: "Ua mau ke ea o ka aina i ka pono—The life of the land is perpetuated in righteousness."

Mr. FULTON. And that is where it ought to be. I am glad to see that a committee of Congress is ahead of us, because they now have the seals up there.

May I say that I am willing to stay in session this afternoon and this evening to put FEPC through, and I will ask for a roll-call vote on adjournment to see who are the friends of FEPC. So that it may be clear in the RECORD, a vote for adjournment is a vote against FEPC.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON] has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD on this proposition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COUDERT].

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, I realize the impatience of my colleagues. In view of the remarks of the majority leader, they realize that at the end of this, the day's burdens will be over and we can retire to other fields and other problems. But it does seem to me that it would be an utter travesty upon parliamentary procedure if there were no voice raised to present the other side of this searching, fundamental issue.

I know I am not going to succeed in blocking the rule, but I do want to protest with the utmost vigor of which I am capable the tragic travesty that is being perpetrated today, a travesty upon parliamentary procedure.

Now, just stop for a moment and contemplate what is being done. Every Member of this House came to this chamber today prepared to vote on a matter of great importance, long debated and bitterly fought, and we are confronted suddenly, without the slightest notice, without any opportunity to give it close and important consideration, with two bills involving the fundamental question of constitutional construction, involving the question of the security of the United States. Both of those bills are thrown in our teeth, solely because, for parliamentary reasons, it is the only way to prevent consideration of FEPC.

If we have any consideration for our own dignity, for our own role in this Government of the United States, then at least let us postpone consideration of these matters. Let us postpone action on this rule until it can be given the importance to which it is properly entitled. Do you not realize that if these two rules and the bills for which they are here, are adopted, that we will add four Senators to the United States Senate? Each one of those four exercises power and influence greater than the power and influence of any one of the biggest delegations in this House. One Senator representing 10,000 citizens of Alaska, one Senator representing 80,000 citizens of Hawaii, will be able, by their freedom of speech to neutralize and to overcome the over 45 Members from the State of New York in this House, and Members from all of the other great States. We ought to postpone this thing. We ought to postpone action on the rule and beat it now, and give ourselves and our people an opportunity to consider what this means before we blindly, blithely, gaily charge into the thing.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON] I think said a little too much, perhaps more than he intended, when he looked at that ceiling and said, "There are two places for the seals of these two proposed States."

He is quite wrong. If you will look at this ceiling, you will see dozens and dozens of places where seals can be put and, believe me, if you enact these two rules and the bills that go with them, those places will be filled, and of right, with new States from the Pacific, Guam, the Virgin Islands, our other island possession, who will come here with attractive, genial, persuasive delegates, like the two gentlemen who represent Alaska and Hawaii with such dignity in this House. Why do they want representation? Their people are represented here by two such persuasive, genial, distinguished gentlemen that they can whip the Membership of this House around their fingers. They are taking us with them. They are taking for themselves statehood and all that it means and all the power and all the influence and all the dignity it means for 20,000 voters in Alaska and a hundred-odd-thousand voters in Hawaii. Please consider before you vote.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, when I was addressing the Chamber a few minutes ago doubt was expressed that I had given sufficient facts regarding the economy and population of the islands. I think these subjects are of interest to the membership. I did state that thorough investigation had been made and hearings held previous to the time that I became chairman of the committee, held under the chairmanship of the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH]. Under his chairmanship subcommittees went into the area from time to time. During the last session of Congress the statehood bill passed the House. The committee resumed its hearings this year and went into the question extensively and brought the figures up to date.

I think it will be of interest to the House to learn some of the population figures in the case of States admitted into the Union in the past. It ran around 60,000 in a number of instances, and in some instances States came into the Union with less population than that. Nevada came in with a population of only 42,000; Louisiana with a population of 76,000. My own great State of Florida came in with only 72,000 and had a rather hard time getting into the Union. There was a tie vote in that case at one time, and the chairman of the Committee broke the tie. So we came in by one vote, but we have paid our way. At that time the question arose as to whether we could pay our territorial debts. But let it be said that the great State of Pennsylvania let us have, through one of its citizens, enough money that we paid our territorial debts. Another question that arose was that of the balance between slave and free States. The question of population likewise came up.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I suppose the gentleman will agree that my great State of Pennsylvania has continued to contribute to Florida through horse races and dog tracks, will he not?

Mr. PETERSON. That is not on my side of the State. I do know, however, that in my part of the State Pennsylvanians own substantial orange groves; and the old Empire Land Co., and the Diston Co. made large purchases in our State and were substantial taxpayers. But enough of that.

What I wish to bring out clearly is that 12 States were admitted to the Union with populations of less than that of Hawaii. In 1945 the population of Hawaii was 502,122. Hawaii had 33,000 citizens in the armed forces of the United States.

As to the financial condition of Hawaii the report compiled after a rather extensive study of the finances of the Territory show that they have been well managed. At the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1945, the total budgetary resources of the Territory amounted to $68,339,384, with total obligations reserved in the amount of $57,000,000, leaving an unappropriated surplus of $10,500,000. The bonded debt of the Territory was $16,000,000, with about half of that in the sinking fund at that time.

So, as far as the population is concerned, as far as the economic feasibility is concerned, and as far as the political aspect is concerned—both parties having planks in their platform pledging statehood to Hawaii—they meet the requirements. They are well able to take care of themselves financially, and they have a population as great as some nine States originally had.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield.

Mr. MILLER of California. I think it also should be brought out that Hawaii pays more taxes into the Federal Treasury than 14 other States in the Union.

Mr. PETERSON. That is my understanding, and that fact is set forth in the report. Those who are interested should get the report. The subcommittee under the chairmanship of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. REDDEN], made an exhaustive study. I was not chairman at the time these figures were reported; I became chairman later.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. PLUMLEY. The gentleman has made a fair and honest presentation and, with apologies to him, what he is bragging about is citizenship, and I would like to know whether he claims Bridges or not as a citizen.

Mr. PETERSON. No; I do not.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself one additional minute.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman has stressed a great deal about the population of Hawaii, which contains about a half million people. Of course, the House approved statehood for Hawaii at one time. Now, is it his opinion that that is about the right population in order to become a State?

Mr. PETERSON. I would not say that, but we did let a large number of States come in with populations from 42,000 upward. However, for a long period of time the population seemed to be around 60,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. Conditions were entirely different when those States with 60,000 came in than they are now.

Mr. PETERSON. That is true; but history shows that after statehood there has been an economic improvement and development in each instance.

Mr. JOHNSON. They were all in the continental area, too.

Mr. PETERSON. Yes.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. ANGELL. May I say to the gentleman that I was a member of the Committee on Territories that held very extensive hearings in the Territory of Hawaii. We held hearings on all of the major islands and we made a very careful investigation of all the factors which enter into statehood. It was the unanimous conclusion of that committee, as I recall it, that Hawaii was entitled to statehood, not only from the standpoint of population but also from the standpoint of industry and in educational facilities, in the character of the people, and also as a matter of national defense it would be advisable to admit Hawaii to statehood.

Mr. PETERSON. The gentleman has more first-hand knowledge of that than I have, and I thank him for his contribution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I shall not worry the Members of the House with the great speech I have prepared on this subject because the Members are anxious to attend to their congressional duties. I do want to say, however, that I am very much in favor of this rule and again I want to say that I am emphatically in favor of statehood for both Alaska and Hawaii.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

SAMUEL GOMPERS VERSUS JOHN L. LEWIS

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, on August 18, 1937, nearly 13 years ago, speaking in the House on the subject, John L. Lewis versus Samuel Gompers, I pointed out the difference between the rule-or-ruin policy of Lewis as a labor leader, and the constructive, unselfish, impersonal leadership of Samuel Gompers, the grand old man of the American labor movement. Among other things in that speech 13 years ago, I said:

> The outstanding present-day example of a labor racketeer is John L. Lewis. His record is a record of ruthlessness and recklessness. His policy has been one of rule or ruin. He prates about democratic government, yet refuses to abide by majority rule when it goes against him. He now proposes to break up and destroy the American Federation of Labor, the organization that the grand old man of labor, Samuel Gompers, created and built up. Lewis has succeeded in dividing American labor into two hostile camps, not realizing that the saying "united we stand, divided we fall" applies particularly and especially to organized labor. I recommend that John L. Lewis refresh his mind by reading Gompers' autobiography entitled, "Seventy Years of Life and Labor."

Mr. Speaker, that speech contrasting the labor policies and objectives of Lewis and Gompers was made when Lewis broke away from the A. F. of L. the first time, and formed his rival labor organization, the CIO. During the past 13 years Lewis has pursued his rule-or-ruin policy consistently, with results that are well known, being very evident in the coal emergency that confronts this Nation today.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it is both pertinent and timely at this time—facing a national emergency brought about by John L. Lewis and his planned coal shortage, and while the Nation is at the same time celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Samuel Gompers—to review and reemphasize the principles that Samuel Gompers followed in creating and establishing the American Federation of Labor. Those principles may be summarized as follows:

First. The main concern of organized labor should be to improve the economic position of wage workers and to obtain general acceptance by employers of the principles of collective bargaining and the closed shop.

Second. The cause of labor should not be identified with any political party and, apart from certain protective legislation, labor should have no long-term political objectives.

Third. The maintenance of the profit system.

Fourth. The virtual autonomy of each international union.

Our present-day labor leaders have departed very far from Gompers' labor principles. If our labor leaders today would follow the principles that guided Sam Gompers we would have no need for the Taft-Hartley law. It was Mr. Lewis' arrogant abuse of power under the Wagner Act that induced Congress 2½ years ago to pass the Taft-Hartley Act over the President's veto.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot refrain at this time from paying my tribute to Samuel Gompers, the founder of the American labor movement, "the greatest Roman of them all." I do so in the words of his devoted secretary, Florence Calvert Thorne:

> The soul of Samuel Gompers lives in its potent influence on national life and customs. It lives in the daily lives of millions of Americans, in the higher standards of life and work generally prevailing; in the higher concept of duty which man owes to those with whom he works and for whom he works; in our enriched understanding of human justice; in an understanding of the finer effects of democracy in daily life; in the realization that human brotherhood is after all a thoroughly practical idea and the only lasting basis for human relations.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. NIXON (at the request of Mr. MACY) was given permission to address the House for 1 hour on Wednesday, January 25, 1950, following the legislative business of the day and other special orders.

Mr. MACY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 hour on Wednesday, January 25, 1950, following the special order granted to Mr. NIXON.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KEOGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix and include an address by Mr. Farley.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WALSH (at the request of Mr. MADDEN), for an indefinite period, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. CURTIS, after 2:30 p. m., for the balance of today, on account of illness in family.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER [after counting]. Fifty-four Members have arisen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. There were many Members who came in and were counted after the standing count was taken. I ask that the vote be taken again.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not going to make the count again because he has just counted both the total number of Members and the number standing to demand the yeas and nays.

The question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. On that I demand tellers, Mr. Speaker.

Tellers were ordered, and the Speaker appointed as tellers Mr. McCORMACK and Mr. MARCANTONIO.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 167, noes 109.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 24, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1714. Also, petition of the Henning Women's Reading Club, signed by Mrs. Nora Stewart, president, and Mrs. Edith Iverson, secretary, in opposition to compulsory health insurance; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1715. By Mr. JUDD: Petition of Mrs. A. L. Bigham and other citizens of Minneapolis, Minn., urging consideration and support of the Bryson bill, H. R. 2428, and a Senate counterpart of that measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1716. By Mr. RICH: Petition of the Lookout Club, of Emporium, Pa., endorsing resolution of General Federation of Women's Clubs against Government control of health services which would jeopardize free enterprise; and resolution of the board of directors of the Pennsylvania Federation of Women's Clubs in opposition to the proposed compulsory health-insurance plan; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1717. By Mr. SHAFER: Petition of the Rotary Club of Kalamazoo, urging adoption of recommendations of the Hoover Commission; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

1718. By Mr. TAYLOR: Petition of Mrs. John Hager and 14 other citizens of Fort Edward, N. Y., urging the passage of Senate bill 1847 and House bill 2428; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1719. Also, petition of Mrs. Isabelle F. Wilson and 18 other citizens of Mooers, N. Y., urging the passage of Senate bill 1847 and House bill 2428; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 24, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met, in executive session, at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal spirit, everywhere present but often unreal to us because we willfully block the channels of our being by which Thou wouldst reach us, open our hearts now to one another and to Thee, as together we bow at this altar which the fathers builded.

We pray for ourselves and for the people of this dear land that genuine fraternity may increase among us and that intolerance and the mutual suspicions of class hatred may not shake our democracy. As we have undertaken here a government of, by, and for the people, may we not lack the spiritual quality without which no such government can long endure. Guide our Nation, in this solemn day of our responsibility and opportunity, to such use of its vast power as may cause all the peoples of the earth to rise up and call us blessed. We pray in the spirit of our Lord and Master. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. LUCAS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, January 23, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. LUCAS, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Foreign Relations was authorized to meet this afternoon during the session of the Senate.

On request of Mr. GEORGE, and by unanimous consent, the Finance Committee was authorized to hold a hearing during the session of the Senate this afternoon.

On request of Mr. FREAR, and by unanimous consent, the Subcommittee on Housing of the Banking and Currency Committee was authorized to hold a meeting this afternoon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. SCHOEPPEL was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate from tonight through Monday because of a death in his immediate family.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. KEM obtained the floor.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM] desires to speak upon the pending question, which is the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. KEM. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] is absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

When the Senate recessed yesterday it recessed in executive session, but technically no nomination was before the Senate for consideration. Therefore the Chair will direct the Secretary to state the nominations on the calendar.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY—NOMINATION PASSED OVER

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Admiral Forrest P. Sherman, United States Navy, to be Chief of Naval Operations in the Department of the Navy, with the rank of admiral, for a term of 4 years.

Mr. LUCAS. I ask that that nomination be passed over temporarily until the other nominations are acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, there are two other nominations on the Executive Calendar. I do not think there will be any question about them. I ask that they be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senate will consider the other two nominations.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James Michael McInerney, of New York, to be an Assistant Attorney General to fill an existing vacancy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Robert H. Mollohan to be United States marshal for the northern district of West Virginia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed, and, without objection, the President will be notified of the nominations which have just been confirmed.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. FREAR, from the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Edward T. McCormick, of Arizona, to be a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission for the remainder of the term expiring June 5, 1952, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate; and Donald C. Cook, of Michigan, to be a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission for the term expiring June 5, 1954, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, as in legislative session, Senators may introduce bills and joint resolutions, present petitions and memorials, and submit routine matters for the RECORD without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BOARDS OF VISITORS TO MILITARY, NAVAL, COAST GUARD, AND MERCHANT MARINE ACADEMIES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, pursuant to law, makes the following appointments to the boards of visitors hereinafter named:

To the United States Military Academy: The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY].

To the United States Naval Academy: The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL].

To the United States Coast Guard Academy: The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS]. On January 17, 1950, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce appointed the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] members of the Board of Visitors to the Coast Guard Academy.

To the United States Merchant Marine Academy: The Senator from Arizona [Mr. MCFARLAND]. On January 17, 1950, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce appointed the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] members of the Board of Visitors to the United States Merchant Marine Academy.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION OF ALIENS

A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting, pursuant to law, copies of orders of the Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service suspending deportation as well as a list of the persons involved, together with a detailed statement of the facts and pertinent provisions of law as to each alien and the reason for ordering such suspension (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT OF CERTAIN CONTRACTS NEGOTIATED BY GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION

A letter from the Administrator of the General Services Administration, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on contracts negotiated for experimental, developmental, or research work for the period July through December 1949 (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A resolution adopted by the New Orleans Area Rent Advisory Board, of New Orleans, La., favoring the extensión of Federal rent control beyond June 30, 1950; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Petitions of sundry citizens of the States of New York and California, praying for the enactment of Senate bill 2181, providing old-age insurance; to the Committee on Finance.

Resolutions adopted by the Fifth Congressional District Council of Townsend Clubs, at Orlo Vista, and the Cassadaga Townsend Club, No. 1, of Cassadaga, both in the State of Florida, favoring the enactment of Senate bill 2181, providing old-age insurance; to the Committee on Finance.

A resolution adopted by the Federation of Jewish Women's Organizations, Inc., of New York, N. Y., favoring the ratification of the convention on genocide; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A letter in the nature of a petition signed by Dorothy Kavaler, social actions chairman, Sisterhood of the Laurelton Jewish Center, Laurelton, Long Island, N. Y., praying for the ratification of the convention on genocide; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A letter in the nature of a petition from Joe A. Saracini, of St. Louis, Mo., relating to the oath of allegiance to the United States (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A resolution adopted by the Junior Order United American Mechanics, United States of North America, Philadelphia, Pa., protesting against the enactment of House bill 4567, to amend the Displaced Persons Act of 1948; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A letter in the nature of a petition, signed by H. W. Henry, of Cowpens, S. C., relating to the claim of James and Porter Henry; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A resolution adopted by the Florida State Dental Society, of Bradenton, Fla., the Indiana State Dental Association, of Indianapolis, Ind., the Allegany-Garrett County Dental Society, of Cumberland, Md., and the Third District Dental Society, of Butte, Mont., protesting against the enactment of legislation providing compulsory health insurance; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

A letter in the nature of a petition from George Franklin Stoner, of Fayette County, W. Va., relating to conditions of employment in the coal industry; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

A letter in the nature of a memorial from George W. Williams, of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for a memorial to the late President Roosevelt; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

A resolution adopted by the Blue Star Mothers of America, Inc., assembled in New York, N. Y., October 31 through November 3, 1949, protesting against the closing by the Navy Department of the Long Beach Navy Shipyard; ordered to lie on the table.

A letter in the nature of a petition, signed by Jack R. McMichael, executive secretary, the Methodist Federation for Social Action, of New York, N. Y., praying for the enactment of the administration's civil-rights program; ordered to lie on the table.

A resolution adopted by the Holdover Committee of the Twenty-fifth Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii; to the Committee on Finance:

"Resolution 38

"Resolution requesting the Congress of the United States to repeal the Federal tax on the transportation of persons as the same affects interisland transportation and transportation between the Territory and the mainland United States

"Whereas the United States now levies a tax of 15 percent of the amount paid for the transportation of persons between the Territory and the mainland United States, and between the several islands of the Territory of Hawaii; and

"Whereas this tax was imposed as a wartime excise to discourage unnecessary transportation of persons, which reason is no longer sufficient to justify continuing its levy; and

"Whereas due to the geographic make-up of the Territory virtually all transportation of persons must be accomplished by commercial means and is therefore subject to the payment of this tax, a condition not true on the mainland with regard to either intrastate or interstate transportation; and

"Whereas this tax materially increases the cost of transportation of persons both from the mainland to the Territory and within the Territory, thus directly contributing to the high cost of living in the Territory and working great hardship on the people of the Territory; and

"Whereas the cost to the carriers of collecting this tax substantially increases the cost of transportation, which cost is ultimately paid by the users of such transportation facilities and results therefore in an additional and unnecessary charge upon the public; and

"Whereas this tax puts Hawaii in a very unfavorable position in its competition with Europe, South and Central America, the Caribbean area, and other southern areas for tourist business, which is Hawaii's third ranking industry and is rapidly increasing in importance, inasmuch as transportation to and from the aforesaid-mentioned areas is not subject to these taxes; and

"Whereas the present unemployment situation in the Territory of Hawaii is such as to make it imperative that every encouragement be given to Hawaii's industries with a view to strengthening Hawaii's economy; and

"Whereas this tax definitely discourages passenger travel via commercial means at a time when transportation systems generally are hard-pressed financially, which is particularly detrimental to the low-income groups in the Territory who cannot afford the resultant higher travel costs in the Territory: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Holdover Committee of the Twenty-fifth Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, That the Congress of the United States be and is hereby respectfully requested to repeal the Federal tax on the transportation of persons as it applies to travel within the Territory of Hawaii and as it applies to travel between the mainland United States and the Territory of Hawaii; and be it further

"Resolved, That duly certified copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii."

By Mr. EASTLAND:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"House Concurrent Resolution 16

"Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to take immediate steps to correct inequities in the present cotton-allotment law

"Whereas the 1950 cotton-acreage-allotment program, as administered under the law from the county level, is obviously penalizing the cotton farmer who, by his history of planted cotton acreage, has been responsible largely for the acreage of cotton allotted to the county; and

"Whereas the county system of making allotments to individual farms is bringing about a state of panic from the standpoint of displacing numerous tenant families from the larger farms, where they have housing facilities and other advantages not available on other farms; and

"Whereas under previous allotment programs, 5 to 8 percent of the allotments were never planted; and

"Whereas it would not jeopardize the welfare of cotton or the cotton farmer if an increase of 1,250,000 acres were granted in the national minimum acreage to be used to correct the inequities: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein), That the United States Congress be memorialized to the effect that the present cotton allotment law will disrupt the economy of Mississippi and will make homeless and destitute thousands of tenant families, and that immediate steps should be taken to correct the inequities of the present law.

"Adopted by the house of representatives, December 14, 1949.

"WALTER SILLERS,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"Adopted by the Senate, December 14, 1949.

"SAM LUMPKIN,
"President of the Senate."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi; to the Committee on Public Works:

"House Concurrent Resolution 8

"Concurrent resolution memoralizing Congress to make an appropriation of $250,000,000 for construction and reconstruction of United States Highway 90

"Whereas section 2 of the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1948 provides that—

" 'The Commissioner of Public Roads is hereby directed to cooperate with the State highway departments in a study of the status of improvement of the national system of interstate highways, designated in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1944; to invite the cooperation and suggestions of the Secretary of Defense and the National Security Resources Board as to their indicated or potential needs for improved highways for the national defense; and to supplement not later than April 1, 1949, the report dated February 1, 1941, entitled "Highways for the National Defense" to reflect current conditions and deficiencies,' and

"Whereas pursuant to said provision a detailed study of the status of improvement of the national system of interstate highways has been made with the complete cooperation of every State highway department and with the cooperation and suggestions of the Secretary of Defense and the National Security Resources Board as to the indicated or potential needs for improved highways for the national defense; and

"Whereas United States Highway 90 was especially designated as a part of the interstate transcontinental highway system and of strategic importance to the national defense, and was shown to be wholly inadequate to safely and properly handle the volume of traffic shown to be using said highway; and

"Whereas the report shows that a portion of Highway 90 traversing the State of Mississippi carries a traffic load considerably in excess of the major portions of Transcontinental Highway 90, and the immediate improvement and construction of this highway to the required standards of the Bureau of Public Roads, particularly that portion traversing and crossing the State of Mississippi, is deemed to be of vital, necessary, and immediate importance to the national defense, serving as it does more permanent Military Establishments of the United States than any other transcontinental highway, and being the major all-weather road in the said national system of interstate highways: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Mississippi Legislature (the senate concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States of America be memorialized to appropriate not less than $250,000,000 for immediate construction and/or reconstruction of said Highway 90 from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean, following generally the present route of said Highway 90, and in conformance to the highway needs of the national defense, and that the priority of said construction and/or reconstruction of said Highway 90 shall be based on the traffic needs as determined by the traffic load or count, as determined by the several State highway departments in cooperation with the Public Roads Administration; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each member of the Mississippi delegation in Congress, and to the Mississippi Senators in the United States Senate.

"Adopted by the house of representatives November 17, 1949.

"WALTER SILLERS,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"Adopted by the senate November 29, 1949.

"SAM LUMPKIN,
"President of the Senate."

A resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"House Resolution

"Resolution memorializing Congress of the United States to take such action as it may deem necessary to bring about a more careful selection of displaced persons before admission of such persons to the United States of America; requesting the Congress of the United States of America to take such action as may be necessary to bring about the deportation of undesirable persons that have been admitted to the United States of America

"Whereas since the close of World War II the United States of America, in an effort to relieve suffering and bring aid to those persons displaced and made homeless as a result of World War II, has admited to the United States of America a large number of displaced persons; and

"Whereas a large number of the people of the State of Mississippi, in an effort to help relieve suffering and to furnish a home for such displaced persons have in good faith spent time and money in bringing about the admission of displaced persons to their farms in the State of Mississippi; and

"Whereas a number of said displaced persons who have been brought into the State of Mississippi have made a good adjustment to the American way of life, and are therefore well started on the road to becoming good citizens, thus deserving the encouragement and best wishes of the people of the State of Mississippi; but

"Whereas it is reported that some of these persons admitted to the United States of America and offered homes and employment have not accepted their admission to the United States in good faith and have not kept faith with their stated purpose and mission in coming to the United States but on the other hand have taken advantage of the attitude of the people of the United States and have used their passport and admission solely for the purpose of getting into the United States with no intention whatsoever of carrying out their agreement and stated purpose of wanting to come into this country and are therefore undesirable citizens; and

"Whereas it is the sense of the Mississippi Legislature that displaced persons who may be found to be undesirable citizens should be deported: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Mississippi House of Representatives, That Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby memorialized, and urged to take such action as it may deem necessary to bring about a strict and careful selection of displaced persons to be admitted to the United States, and that no legislation be enacted by the Congress relaxing the rules or increasing the number who may be admitted to this country. The Congress is further urged to take such action as it may deem necessary to bring about the immediate deportation of all displaced persons who have been admitted to the United States of America and have proved themselves to be undesirable citizens; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be spread at large upon the journals of the House and that copies of this resolution be forwarded by the Clerk of the House to Members of the United States Senate and Members of Congress of the State of Mississippi, and that copies of this resolution be furnished to the press.

"Adopted by the House of Representatives December 15, 1949.

"WALTER SILLERS,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives."

INVESTIGATION OF PRICES OF PETROLEUM PRODUCTS — RESOLUTION OF CITY COUNCIL OF ST. PAUL, MINN.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the City Council of the City of St. Paul, Minn., favoring an investigation of petroleum prices in St. Paul and adjacent areas.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the oil companies supplying fuel oil to this area have recently simultaneously announced an increase in the price of fuel oil, which is the second increase in the price during the current heating season, and

Whereas similar increases in the price of gasoline have likewise been made simultaneously by said companies; and

Whereas substantially all the fuel oil, gasoline and other petroleum products used in this area are brought to St. Paul by barge line during the navigation season on the Mississippi River, and by pipe line from the oil fields and refineries, and

Whereas when the improvement of navigation on the Mississippi River was inaugurated and during the completion thereof it was represented that the cost of transporting commodities, including petroleum products, by river would be substantially less than the cost of transportation by rail, and likewise when the said pipe line was installed it was also represented that the cost of transporting gasoline and oil by pipe line would be substantially less than the cost of transportation by rail, and the City Council of the City of St. Paul is informed and believes that such is the fact but that said council has no means available to secure definite data relative to such cost of transportation, and

Whereas it appears that the prices charged to dealers in this area for such petroleum products are as high or higher than the prices in other areas served only by rail and not served by pipe line or barge line,

Resolved by the City Council of the City of St. Paul, That our representatives in Congress are hereby requested to cause an investigation to be made into the prices of such petroleum products in St. Paul and adjacent areas, including the relative cost of transportation of the same by rail, pipe line and barge line, and whether or not such concerted action by the oil companies in simultaneously raising the prices of petroleum products is a violation of the law respecting restraints of trade.

Resolved further, That the city clerk is directed to send copies of this resolution to United States Senators EDWARD J. THYE and HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Representative EUGENE J. MCCARTHY, and the Minneapolis City Council.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following report of a committee was submitted:

By Mr. MAYBANK, from the Committee on Banking and Currency:

S. Res. 218. Resolution continuing the authority for investigation of banking and credit legislation, small business, and economic stabilization; without amendment (Rept. No. 1236).

INVESTIGATION OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION AND ITS SUBSIDIARIES

Mr. FULBRIGHT, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 219), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to conduct a full and complete inquiry into the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its subsidiaries, with special attention given to the recommendations of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government with respect to such Corporation and its subsidiaries.

SEC. 2. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it may deem advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than June 1, 1950.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to employ upon a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable, and is authorized, with the consent of the head of the department or agency concerned, to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $50,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

REPORT ON DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, from the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Executive Papers, to which was referred for examination and recommendation a list of records transmitted to the Senate by the Archivist of the United States that appeared to have no permanent value or historical interest, submitted a report thereon pursuant to law.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

(Mr. SALTONSTALL introduced Senate bill 2917, to promote the foreign policy of the United States and to authorize participation in a cooperative endeavor for assisting in the development of economically underdeveloped areas of the world, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. TYDINGS (by request):

S. 2918. A bill for the relief of E. G. Morris; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. EASTLAND (for himself, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. HILL, Mr. MCCLELLAN, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, and Mr. SPARKMAN):

S. 2919. A bill relating to farm-acreage allotments for cotton under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. TAFT:

S. 2920. A bill to extend for 1 year the authorization for an appropriation for the International Children's Emergency Fund; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. PEPPER:

S. 2921. A bill authorizing the naturalization of Stavros S. Niarchos; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mrs. SMITH of Maine:

S. J. Res. 150. Joint resolution designating the third Sunday in September of each year as Children's Day in Sports; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. MALONE introduced Senate Joint Resolution 151, to prohibit financial aid to any foreign country engaging in trade with Russia, her satellite countries, or any other area dominated or controlled by Russia, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and appears under a separate heading.)

ASSISTANCE TO UNDERDEVELOPED AREAS OF THE WORLD

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to implement point 4. On September 15, 1949, I introduced a similar bill, S. 2561. It was identical to a bill introduced by Representative HERTER in the House of Representatives. When this bill was introduced it was with the intention of bringing about discussion and criticisms to see if there could not be a meeting of minds among various interested parties. Since that time a number of conferences have been held and discussions taken place between those interested in industry and labor, various executive departments of the Government, and other persons interested in foreign trade and the welfare of friendly nations. As a result, Representative HERTER introduced on January 18 H. R. 6835, which goes a long way toward resolving differences of opinion as to the implementation of point 4, which existed 6 months ago.

I am now introducing the same bill so that the Senate may have before it an up-to-date expression of minds upon this problem. I am sure even this bill can be improved after more study.

The bill (S. 2917) to promote the foreign policy of the United States and to authorize participation in a cooperative endeavor for assisting in the development of economically underdeveloped areas of the world, introduced by Mr. SALTONSTALL, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN DOCUMENTS AND RECORDS TO NATIONAL ARCHIVES AND RECORDS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an order and ask for its immediate consideration and adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the order for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the order, as follows:

Ordered, That the Sergeant at Arms be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer to the National Archives and Records all documents and records now in his possession impounded and received pursuant to Senate Resolution 295, Seventy-fifth Congress, third session, agreed to June 16, 1938, in connection with the investigation of air-mail and ocean-mail contracts, under Senate Resolution 349, agreed to February 25, 1933, as amended and supplemented.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the order?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, let me inquire of the distinguished majority leader what makes this order necessary. Is it because of a lack of space?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct. A number of documents involving the investigation dealing with these contracts are now ready to be removed to the National Archives, and the Sergeant at Arms merely wishes to have the order to do so, so that it will be possible to get them out of the way, to permit more space for other records.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order is adopted.

HOW CONGRESS MAKES A LAW—ADDRESS BY SENATOR MYERS

[Mr. MYERS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address on the subject How Congress Makes a Law, broadcast by him to the people of Pennsylvania, which appears in the Appendix.]

FORMOSA AND THE TRUMAN DOCTRINE—EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

[Mr. LUCAS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Tears of the Crocodile," published in the Washington Post of January 24, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE LAWYER—EULOGY BY LOUIS LANDE

[Mr. MURRAY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a eulogy of the American lawyer, by Louis Lande, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE QUACK—EDITORIAL FROM THE OMAHA EVENING WORLD-HERALD

[Mr. BUTLER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Quack," published in the Omaha Evening World-Herald of January 20, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

WHEAT FOR INDIA

[Mr. HUMPHREY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter regarding wheat for India, written by Mr. J. J. Singh, president of the India League of America, and published in the New York Times of December 25, 1949, which appears in the Appendix.]

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON REDUCTION OF NONESSENTIAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES—CIVILIAN EMPLOYMENT AND PAY IN EXECUTIVE BRANCH

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, conforming with the practice followed over the past 7 years, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, I submit a report on civilian employment and pay in the executive branch of the Federal Government for the month of November 1949, together with a statement by me, with the request that the statement and report be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement and report were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD, CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON REDUCTION OF NONESSENTIAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES, IN CONNECTION WITH THE MONTHLY REPORT ON FEDERAL PERSONNEL AND PAY, OCTOBER–NOVEMBER 1949

Civilian employment in the Military Establishment was reduced by 90,124 in the first 3 months under the personnel-retrenchment order by Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson.

Civilian employees on the pay rolls of the Army, Air Force, Navy, and the Office of the Secretary of Defense totaled 858,786 when the Secretary's order was issued in August. In November the total had been reduced by 10½ percent, to 768,662.

Army civilian employment in the 3-month period was reduced by 33,357 (9½ percent) to 320,995. Air Force civilian employment was reduced by 17,633 (10½ percent) to 151,650. Navy civilian employment was reduced by 39,290 (nearly 12 percent) to 294,296. Civilian employment in the Office of the Secretary was increased by 10 percent, to 1,721.

INDUSTRIAL EMPLOYMENT HIT

Seventy percent or 67,760 of those separated from the civilian rolls were industrial employees, largely outside the classified civil service. Of the total separations 18,468 were employed outside continental United States.

UNIFORMED PERSONNEL ALSO REDUCED

Accompanying the reduction in civilian employees, there was also a reduction in the uniformed personnel of the armed forces. In the same 3 months' period the number of uniformed personnel dropped by 29,000.

There was still more than one civilian employee in the Military Establishment for each two men in uniform.

The President's budget proposals for the new fiscal year beginning next July would provide for an average civilian employment through the year of 725,000 in the Military Establishment.

SLIGHT DECREASE IN CIVILIAN AGENCIES

While civilian employment in the Military Establishment was being reduced by 90,124 the number of employees on the pay rolls of the civilian agencies in the executive branch decreased by 14,020 during September, October, and November. The total reduction during the period totaled 104,144.

LOWEST SINCE 1942

These reductions brought the total employment in the executive branch in November down to 1,985,965, the lowest point since 1942.

These figures were revealed in the current compilation, by the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, of personnel reports submitted to the committee by the various agencies of the Federal Government.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT STILL INCREASING

Reductions in the Military Establishment were steady during all 3 months, including November. And in November there were some substantial reductions also in Agriculture, Commerce, and Interior Departments among the civilian agencies.

The principal increase was reported by the Post Office Department where employment continued its continuous rise. With a November increase of 2,709, post-office employment rose to another all-time peak of 533,370.

FEDERAL PERSONNEL IN THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH OCTOBER–NOVEMBER 1949, AND PAY SEPTEMBER–OCTOBER 1949

Note with reference to personal service expenditure figures: It should be noted that the latest expenditure figures for personal service shown in table I of this report are for the month of October, and that they are compared with personal service expenditure figures for the month of September, whereas the latest employment figures covered in this report are for the month of November and are compared with the month of October. This lag in personal service expenditure figures is necessary in order that actual expenditures may be reported.

(Figures in the following report are compiled from signed official personnel reports by the various agencies and departments of the Federal Government. Table I shows total personnel employed inside and outside continental United States, and pay, by agency. Table II shows personnel employed inside continental United States. Table III shows personnel employed outside continental United States. Table IV gives by agency the industrial workers employed by the Federal Government. For purposes of comparisons, figures for the previous month are shown in adjoining columns.)

PERSONNEL AND PAY SUMMARY

(See table I)

According to monthly personnel reports for November 1949 submitted to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures:

Agency	Civilian personnel in executive branch			Pay roll (in thousands of dollars) in executive branch
	In November numbered—	In October numbered—	Increase (+) or decrease (−)	In October was—	In September was—	Increase (+) or decrease (−)
Total	1,985,965	2,006,373	−20,408	528,383	547,230	−18,847
1. Agencies exclusive of National Military Establishment	1,217,303	1,221,367	−4,064	314,512	324,611	−10,099
2. National Military Establishment	768,662	785,006	−16,344	213,871	222,619	−8,748
Within National Military Establishment:
Office of Secretary of Defense	1,721	1,740	−19	611	608	+3

Department of the Navy	294,296	301,958	−7,662	86,455	91,778	−5,323

Table I breaks down the above figures on employment and pay by agency.

Tables II, III, and IV break down the above employment figures to show the number inside continental United States, outside continental United States, and the number in the so-called industrial categories. This further break-down in tables II, III, and IV does not include pay figures because pay-roll reports submitted to the committee by some agencies are inadequate for this purpose.

INSIDE CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES

(See table II)

Federal personnel within the United States decreased 15,054 from the October total of 1,847,203 to the November total of 1,832,149.

Exclusive of the National Military Establishment there was a decrease of 3,508 from the October total of 1,163,677 to the November total of 1,160,169.

CHANGES IN NUMBER OF CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES AND COST OF PERSONNEL IN EXECUTIVE BRANCH

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, among the services rendered the Congress and the public by the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures is the compilation of the civilian-employment record of the agencies in the executive branch of the Federal Government.

Due to the recess several months have elapsed since the last monthly report of the committee on this subject was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I submit two tables which set forth the changes in the personnel situation since that time, covering the period from June to November 1949.

The first table sets forth the changes in the number of employees in the various agencies of the executive branch. The second table sets forth the changes in the costs of personal services in these agencies.

It may be noted that the first table is broken down to show total employment, employment inside continental United States, employment outside continental United States, and industrial employment.

I request publication of the tables in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ST. LAWRENCE POWER AND SEAWAY PROJECT

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present, for 3 minutes, some remarks in regard to the St. Lawrence power project.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from New York may proceed.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, one of the most urgent and vital problems confronting New York State, the entire Middle West, and the entire northeastern section of our country is the question of the development of the St. Lawrence River and its power and navigational potentialities.

As everyone knows, the national administration, under both Presidents Roosevelt and Truman, has been seeking to obtain congressional approval for a St. Lawrence seaway and power development agreement with Canada since 1933. Today, 16 years later, that agreement is still pending in the Congress. The New York State Power Authority has applied to the Federal Power Commission for permission to undertake the St. Lawrence power project alone, and is seeking at the same time approval for this project from the International Joint Commission, a United States-Canadian body set up to review these matters.

An examiner for the Federal Power Commission recently recommended that the application of the New York Power Authority be denied. The Federal Power Commission is considering, or will consider, the recommendation of its examiner in this regard. It is at the moment considering a request by the New York Power Authority for a hearing on this question.

As some of my distinguished colleagues in the Senate may know, the junior Senator from New York, in his previous capacity as Governor of New York, was, and continues to be, a wholehearted advocate of the St. Lawrence seaway and power development project. I shall fight for that project in every way I can as a Member of the Senate.

Meanwhile, however, it is the fervent hope of the junior Senator from New York that the application of the New York Power Authority will not be turned down by the Federal Power Commission, merely in anticipation of what Congress may or may not do on the dual-purpose project. I have, therefore, asked the Federal Power Commission to refrain from allowing its anticipation of what Congress may do to prejudice its decision on the application of the New York Power Authority. I have asked that, as a minimum, the Power Commission postpone its final decision on the application of the New York Power Authority until the congressional outlook on this matter is clarified. I have written a letter to this effect to the Federal Power Commission.

Mr. President, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that I may be permitted to insert in the body of my remarks here today the letter referred to above, which was addressed to the Chairman of the Federal Power Commission.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. NELSON LEE SMITH,
Chairman, Federal Power Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SMITH: I understand that on January 12 the Federal Power Commission announced that it would review the proposed order and decision of the examiner on the application of the Power Authority of the State of New York for a license on what is known as project No. 2000 in St. Lawrence County, N. Y., the proposed construction of a power development system on the St. Lawrence.

As you may know—and as is brought out in the record of the proceedings before you—I have worked for many years for the development of the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence, both for navigation and for power-development purposes. My wholehearted support of the undertaking was set forth in my message to the New York State Legislature on January 14, 1941, and is, I believe, referred to in the proceedings. I have made many other official statements in support of this program.

As you know, the Federal-State accord of 1933 provided for the ownership and the operation of the power facilities on the New York side of the St. Lawrence by the State of New York, upon the assumption by the State of the allocated cost. This accord was arrived at during my administration as Governor and has since been included in all proposed legislation and international treaties covering the St. Lawrence project. I see no reason to change my position on this matter.

I intend, as a Member of the Senate, to continue to press, with all my efforts and energies, for the approval by Congress of the necessary arrangements to see the St. Lawrence power and seaway project become a reality. In the past I have testified before the appropriate congressional committee in support of this legislation. I am prepared to do so again, as a Member of the Senate, if and when hearings are held.

The congressional schedule for the consideration of this matter in the Senate is, at this moment, far from clear. I have always taken the position—and I still maintain it—that, if some insuperable obstacle should hold up the dual project, the power project at least should be approved forthwith, and the fight for the seaway project carried on with unremitting vigor thereafter.

It is for this reason that I should like to submit to the Commission my earnest opinion that the application submitted by the State of New York to your Commission should, at the very minimum, remain pending without prejudice until the legislative situation with regard to the dual-purpose project is clarified and the attitude of the administration is further defined. You realize, I am sure, that the application presented by the State of New York was the result of years of preparation, involving substantial cost to the taxpayers of New York. It should not be prejudiced by a summary anticipation of what the Congress may or may not do with regard to the dual-purpose project.

I hope to present a formal statement to the Commission before a decision is reached in this proceeding and shall greatly appreciate your keeping me advised of the status of your considerations.

Yours very sincerely,

HERBERT H. LEHMAN.

AMERICAN POLICY IN THE FAR EAST

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, on January 9 I delivered an address in this body on American policy in the Far East. Therein I endeavored to outline a proposal for American action with respect to Formosa, which is threatened with invasion by the Chinese Communists. Stated briefly, my proposal was that the United States should sponsor and support a program of political reform and economic rehabilitation on the island, by agreement with the Chinese Nationalists and the Formosan people; that negotiation should be undertaken to the end that aggressive hostilities from Formosa against the Chinese mainland should be suspended; and that the United States should undertake to join in the defense of Formosa, together with the existing defending forces there, in the case of an actual invasion attempt by the Chinese Communists on the mainland. I stressed my belief that we, as the occupying power in Japan, had a definite responsibility for Formosa, a former Japanese possession whose sovereignty is still uncertain pending the completion of a peace treaty with Japan.

Since making that address, I have been disturbed by continued reports in the press that I was advocating forcible American seizure of Formosa, or an indefinite military occupation there with American troops. In particular, I noticed a column in the New York Times of Sunday, January 15, by the distinguished journalist Arthur Krock, which described my position as a maximum proposal that the Army should occupy Formosa indefinitely.

Because of my feeling that this statement reflected a seriously mistaken impression as to my real position on this vital question, I prepared a detailed letter to Mr. Krock setting forth the background of my views, which I sent to him on January 18. I ask unanimous consent to have the text of this letter inserted in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, in Formosa the United States has a priceless opportunity to take peaceful action in support of democracy and economic reform, and against the further encroachment of communism in the Pacific. I believe that we can find a way of making our ideal effective in the Formosa situation without involving ourselves in a vast and unpredictable military commitment. As I have said repeatedly, I see no need to send a single American soldier to Formosa. I still hold to my belief set forth in my report to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on December 1, that one of the crucial errors of recent American policy in China has been the conclusion that the only alternative to further military aid was complete abandonment or at least temporary inaction.

The future of Formosa is an unwritten page of history. There is today a possibility that an independent republic can eventually be established there. There is today a strong possibility for a peaceful development on that island which will implement the ideals which America holds in common with the vast majority of far-eastern peoples—national independence, economic development, and personal freedom. It is up to the United States to face the ruthless ideological power of communism by exerting itself in this area, everywhere in the world, in support of the precious human values, which we Americans believe in.

JANUARY 18, 1950.

Mr. ARTHUR KROCK,
New York Times Bureau,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR ARTHUR: I very much appreciate your letter of January 16 with the clippings from the New York Times (which I return herewith), giving your reasons for stating in your column of January 15 that my proposal was "that the Army should occupy Formosa indefinitely."

From various press accounts, including those in the Times, I had been aware for some time that the press had not fully understood my position on the Formosa question. In my speech in the Senate on January 9 I endeavored to make that position entirely clear, but I quite understand how you and other members of the press, on the basis of my earlier statements, might have mistaken my true meaning.

In the hope of clarifying this misunderstanding, I am writing now to give you some of the background of my thinking on the Formosa problem, and particularly on the question of occupation. I appreciate your courteous offer to write further on this subject, and leave it to your judgment whether or not to do so in light of what follows. * * *

Most of what I have said on this subject appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 9, pages 150 to 170. Let me first quote certain passages bearing on the matter of occupation.

1. From my letter to Secretary Acheson, November 4, 1949:

"If we can still take the position that technically it (Formosa) is part of Japan, and that as we are occupying Japan we have a responsibility for all Japanese possessions, we could, I believe, perfectly consistently take it over by our occupancy, with notice to the United Nations that it might be made a trusteeship area. This should be done in collaboration with the Nationalist Government that is there and with the Taiwan people themselves, who I believe would be anxious to take such a step. If this were done, the Chinese Communists would be faced with the responsibility of attacking the United States if they attacked Formosa under these conditions."

2. From my report to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, December 1, 1949, the following item 4 in my list of Specific Immediate Recommendations:

"4. Program of reform and rehabilitation—no military aid.

"While I would recommend that we continue our present recognition of the Nationalist Government as long as it survives, I would leave the question of further military aid to the discretion of the President. * * * As a policy we should emphasize primarily the importance of the development of an ideological program of reform and rehabilitation, which should be practically applied immediately in the areas still occupied by the Nationalists.

"What I mean by this is that there should be developed a reform program in the non-Communist western provinces, in the area of Chungking (until and unless Chungking falls), on the island of Hainan, and particularly on the island of Formosa. On the island of Formosa there is an outstanding opportunity to develop for the Formosan people themselves a program which would mean the assurance of their freedom and the rehabilitation of their industries, and especially of their agriculture. I believe that this possibility should be explored immediately with the Nationalist Government now in control of Formosa and with the Taiwan people themselves, who are opposed both to the Chinese Communists and also to the Nationalists. I believe that the Taiwan people would cooperate with the Nationalist Government in setting up through our ECA operations a type of recovery which might be an example to other provinces in China now in desperate need. Furthermore, Formosa is ideally located for the development of our Voice of America program which, however, I would not call the Voice of America, but rather the voice of the New China."

3. And, immediately following, this passage from my fifth recommendation:

"5. Formosa must not fall into hostile hands.

"At the present moment Formosa has an uncertain legal status. It was a part of Japan prior to World War II. It is occupied today by the Chinese Nationalist forces because it was agreed at Cairo that it would be returned to China at the conclusion of the Japanese war. Technically, however, until the peace treaty with Japan is ratified the area is still a part of Japanese territory and could be included in our Japanese military occupation. I recommend that this situation be carefully explored with the further recommendation that any possible steps taken should be reported at once to the United Nations with an expression of determination on our part to keep the island out of the war area and to assist in its economic development."

4. From my letter to Secretary Acheson, December 27, 1949, the first two of the four recommendations I made therein:

"I. The United States should immediately engage in informal conversations with Mr. K. C. Wu, the new Governor of Formosa, with the purpose of arranging for the occupation of the island by the United States. Since the United States, representing the conquerors of Japan, is now in occupation of Japan the logic of the situation would seem to suggest that the United States should also be in friendly and peaceful occupation of Formosa until such time as the ultimate sovereignty of the island is determined. Inasmuch as the Chinese Nationalist Government was our ally in the last war and is still recognized as the legitimate government of China, we might consider a joint occupation pending the conclusion of the Japanese peace treaty.

"II. The United States should explore with the Nationalist Government the possibility during the occupation of either (a) the suspension of aggressive hostilities against the Communists, including the blockade, or (b) carrying on such activity from some base other than Formosa, such as Hainan. The success of any further aggressive action on the part of the Nationalist Government appears extremely doubtful and the Nationalist Government might welcome the opportunity for the temporary cessation of hostilities during the period of this occupation. The Nationalist Government would be supported by the United States if necessary against aggression by any outside force, but it should preferably not be used during the period of occupation as a base for aggressive operations against the Communists on the mainland."

5. From my January 9 speech itself, in which I discussed the above recommendations as follows:

"Here I want to make it clear, Mr. President, that by the word 'occupation' I do not mean to imply the sending of American troops to Formosa, but simply the establishment of a joint political authority and responsibility there between ourselves, the Nationalists, and the Formosan people. I do not think it is necessary to send a single soldier there. I think this matter can be approached from the other angle."

And after this discussion I continued as follows:

"My purpose in proposing such a policy is twofold: to avoid the antidemocratic and antiprogressive influence of the armed camp on Formosa, so that reasonable hope may be entertained for political and economic progress; and—even more vital from the standpoint of American interests—to avoid the possibility that our intervention in Formosa would draw us into an unlimited military commitment and an eventual shooting match with the Communists and even the Russians.

"For this purpose the United States might well go beyond the above suggestion. I believe the United States could and should make the following stipulations, or should at least explore them, as a prior condition of our giving aid to the Formosa regime:

"First. All aggressive action against the Communists from Formosa shall cease. Remaining military activity on Formosa shall be restricted entirely to a defensive state of readiness against the possibility of Communist assault on the island from the mainland.

"Second. Formosa shall be governed by a regime jointly agreed upon by the Chinese Nationalists and by representatives of the native population. The policy of this regime shall be to develop the economy of the island for the benefit of the population, and to establish firmly the institutions and practices of democratic self-government.

"I ask my colleagues to note this (next) point, because this is one, of course, which has controversial features, but I submit it as a sound approach:

"Third. Under its authority as the occupying power in Japan, the United States will supervise the carrying out of these conditions and will guarantee the nonaggressive status of the island. American authority over Formosa will continue, on the terms laid down, until further determination of the island's status under the Japanese peace treaty. All these steps, and the policy underlying them, would be reported by us at once to the United Nations. * * *

"Under such a formula, in my judgment, the United States could still pursue its historic policy of friendship and support for a free Chinese people without assuming a dangerous and unlimited military commitment, and without giving aid and comfort to any Nationalist leaders who may entertain the foolish notion that American aid will help them reconquer China from Formosa by force of arms. I think such a formula, by granting an adequate defense to the Nationalists on Formosa—because that is what we would do—while committing them to foreswear any aggressive intentions, would go far to deter the Communists from an invasion attempt. But at that point, we can think in terms of the suggestion by former President Hoover and by our colleague the Senator from Ohio, Mr. TAFT, namely, that on the defensive side it might be well or necessary to send a few warships into the area. I am thinking only in terms of defense and eliminating all possibility of aggressive warfare on the island."

6. From a list of questions which I submitted to the Secretary of State, at a meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee on January 13:

"Would you as Secretary of State be willing to recommend to the President that the United States cooperate in exploring the possibility of making Formosa a neutralized independent republic with a democratic form of government under the defensive protection of the United States for a fixed period of time until the disposition of the island has been determined by the Japanese peace treaty, or until the United Nations is willing and able to assume full protective responsibility?

"Would the Department of State and the administration be willing to consider the submission to the World Court the question of the legal status of Formosa pending the signing and ratification of the Japanese peace treaty?"

From this record it seems to me that the following points deserve to be made respecting my position:

1. I have never recommended sending American troops to Formosa.

2. I have never suggested that the United States seize the island, or that we undertake any responsibility there without the full agreement of the Chinese and Taiwan people.

3. I have never proposed an American intervention of indefinite duration, but have always urged that it end with the determination of the legal status of Formosa under the Japanese peace treaty, which I hope will be concluded at an early date.

4. I have never proposed that the United States underwrite a Nationalist counteroffensive from Formosa against the mainland.

5. I have repeatedly sought to emphasize peaceful and constructive activity and to avoid an over-emphasis on military activity, which, in my view, has hitherto characterized our policy in China and has contributed to the collapse of the Nationalist cause. This is in line with my conviction that the Communist success has been due fundamentally not to military but to psychological factors, and that we must win over them in the war of ideas if we are to win at all.

I stress these points because there has been a tendency in the press, which has disturbed me greatly, to interpret my position as an advocacy of an American imperialist venture of some sort, backed up by military might and nothing else. I am entirely opposed to any such course, as a reading of my public statements will show. To reemphasize this, let me add only these two statements from my report of December 1:

(a) At the end of part III, the Problem of China:

"In my judgment, we have overlooked a far more important factor than mere military might. That factor is what might be called the psychological or ideological factor which could have meant support and backing for those high-minded Chinese whom we well knew and who were seeking reform and who should never have been given the discouragement that came from the feeling that their old traditional friend, the United States, had abandoned them in their time of greatest crisis."

(b) From item No. 1 in part IV, "Overall Observations":

"It is immediately obvious to anyone visiting the Far East that there is a widespread yearning among the peoples in this area to express their own nationalism and to be free from external controls. There is definitely a revolt against imperialism in any form and the traditional colonialism. * * * Whatever policy we adopt in the future must recognize this normal and commendable urge for self-expression."

In light of the foregoing, I cannot help thinking that to say I propose "That the Army should occupy Formosa indefinitely" does not accurately reflect my position, not only as to what I have specifically proposed in a military way, but—more important—as to the peaceful, constructive, nonmilitary approach which I believe is of the highest importance and which I have always sought to emphasize.

I very much appreciate your thoughtfulness in this matter, and will be happy to talk further with you about it at any time.

Always cordially yours,

H. ALEXANDER SMITH.

NOMINATION OF ADMIRAL FORREST P. SHERMAN TO BE CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination temporarily passed over will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Admiral Forrest P. Sherman, United States Navy, to be Chief of Naval Operations in the Department of the Navy, with the rank of admiral, for a term of 4 years.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I wish to make it clear at the outset of what I have to say that I do not oppose the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Forrest P. Sherman. I am told, and I believe, that he is a man of high character and distinguished achievement, and that he is qualified to act in the important position of Chief of Naval Operations and to serve as a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

My purpose is to register my emphatic disapproval of the removal of Admiral Louis E. Denfeld from the post now to be occupied by Admiral Sherman and the manner in which the removal of Admiral Denfeld was brought about. I believe that the facts connected with Admiral Denfeld's removal, if fully understood by the Congress and by the American people, "will plead like angels trumpet tongued."

In order to make my position known, I should say that I do not have the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with either Admiral Sherman or his predecessor, Admiral Denfeld. My only personal experience in the armed forces has been in the infantry. I have never had, and do not now have, any personal contact with the Navy. In this matter my interest is, not in personalities, but in principles. I am against neither the Army, nor the Navy, nor the Air Force. I am for justice. I am for the Constitution.

Two important principles are here involved:

First, justice is the end of government; and a grave injustice has been done a distinguished officer.

Second, the dignity and the position of the Congress as a separate and coordinate branch of the Government are challenged.

I realize fully the power and the authority of the Presidency that is marshaled to sustain and support what has been done. I am encouraged, Mr. President, by the knowledge that in a really just cause the weak in the end may conquer the strong.

APPEARANCE OF ADMIRAL DENFELD BEFORE A HOUSE COMMITTEE

As Senators will recall, last fall grave charges were made involving our national defense. Accusations were voiced that the security of the Nation was imperiled by basic disagreements within the Department of Defense, particularly with regard to carrying out the so-called unification law. The House Armed Services Committee, after deliberation, ordered an investigation. Admiral Denfeld was called as a witness. No one can question at this late date the constitutional right of the House to inform itself, through committees of inquiry, on subjects which fall within its legislative competence. In the case of McGrain v. Daugherty (273 U. S. 135, decided in 1926), the Supreme Court said:

. A legislative body cannot legislate wisely or effectively in the absence of information respecting the conditions which the legislation is intended to affect or change; and where the legislative body does not itself possess the requisite information—which not infrequently is true—recourse must be had to others who do possess it.

It is well understood that this prerogative in Congress is limited by the right of the President to have his subordinates refuse to testify either in court or before a committee of Congress concerning matters of confidence between them and himself.

At the time when this matter arose, Admiral Denfeld was a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Section 202, subsection (c), paragraph 6, of the National Security Act, as amended, provides:

No provision of this act shall be so construed as to prevent a Secretary of a military department or a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff from presenting to the Congress on his own initiative, after first informing the Secretary of Defense, any recommendation relating to the Department of Defense that he may deem proper.

It is unnecessary for us to consider whether or not the President could have prevented Admiral Denfeld's appearance before a committee of the Congress if he had desired to do so. That is beside the point. The President, in fact, offered no objection. Admiral Denfeld appeared with the knowledge and approval of the Secretary of Defense. Once having appeared before the committee, it became his duty as a witness to give the committee his best judgment, without bias or reservation, on such matters involving the national defense as to which inquiry should be made of him.

For Admiral Denfeld or any of the other witnesses to have done otherwise would have reflected on their good faith and their qualifications to hold a high place in the armed forces. Admiral Denfeld, therefore, had no alternative but to present the facts as he saw them.

PROMISE OF IMMUNITY

Now we come, Mr. President, to the real crux of this matter, as I see it. Admiral Denfeld and other witnesses who appeared before the House committee were promised that there would be no reprisals as a result of their testimony.

Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson, testifying before the House committee on August 23, 1949, in connection with the investigation of the B–36 bomber program, stated:

Every department, agency, and individual has been and will be available for free and complete testimony at your call.

After Mr. Johnson had concluded his prepared statement on that question, Representative DEWEY SHORT, a distinguished Member of the House from my State of Missouri, questioned Mr. Johnson closely on this phase of his testimony. Here verbatim is the colloquy which occurred:

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Secretary, it is very reassuring to have you state in your well-prepared statement that there was no censorship, no suppression, and there will be none.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right.

Mr. SHORT. One of the finest sentences in your entire statement is on page 1 where I think you correctly stated, in discussing the cooperation of your Department with counsel and this committee, at the end of the first paragraph: "Every department, agency, and individual has been and will be available for free and complete testimony at your call."

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHORT. Without any witness having entertained the slightest notion of suffering reprisal.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is correct.

Mr. SHORT. It is unthinkable that a man, occupying your high office, which perhaps is the most powerful next to the President of the United States, would penalize any department or any agency or any individual to be called here to testify before this committee.

Secretary JOHNSON. They will not, and have not.

Mr. SHORT. I have felt that and I am very glad that you incorporated that statement in your prepared testimony, so that if we happen to have some members of other branches of the armed services testify here, whose testimony would conflict with the testimony that other witnesses have given, they need not fear any reprisal or suffer any reprisal.

Secretary JOHNSON. You may from this record reassure them if they need such, which I doubt.

On October 6, 1949, the House Armed Services Committee began hearings on unification and strategy affecting the national defense program. Before commencing with the testimony of the witnesses, Chairman VINSON, of the committee, made a brief introductory statement. He said:

I would like to say on behalf of the committee, although I believe this comment is probably unnecessary, that it is the intent of the committee that all testimony given shall be frankly and freely given and be given without reprisals in the Department of Defense against any individual presenting testimony during the course of these hearings.

This committee will not permit nor tolerate any reprisals against any witness in these hearings, nor will we permit nor tolerate any shepherding of the testimony being presented. We want these witnesses to speak what is in their minds, to put their cards on the table, and to do so without hesitation or personal concern. We are going to the bottom of this unrest and concern in the Navy. And the committee expects full cooperation in this effort from the Department of Defense.

Secretary of the Navy Matthews, when he testified a few minutes later, stated:

All of us in the Navy desire to cooperate with your committee in every possible way. To that end, let me assure the committee that any naval officer or enlisted man or any Navy civilian whom your committee wants to hear, or who desires to be heard by your committee, is completely free to testify. There has been no censorship. There will be none.

THE TESTIMONY OF ADMIRAL DENFELD

On the basis of the unequivocal assurance given by the administration that there would be no reprisals, no walking the plank, Admiral Denfeld proceeded to present to the House committee certain criticisms of the policies then being carried out by the Department of National Defense. For example, the admiral gave it as his opinion that "the Navy is not accepted in full partnership in the national-defense structure."

THE IMPLICATIONS OF ADMIRAL DENFELD'S REMOVAL

The committee hearings were concluded on October 21, 1949. On October 27, 6 days later, President Truman appointed a successor to Admiral Denfeld and thereby brought about his removal. Admiral Denfeld was summarily removed from his post, despite the fact that he had been reappointed to a second term of 2 years as Chief of Naval Operations less than 2 months before he was removed. Despite the denial of the administration that Admiral Denfeld's removal was an act of recrimination, it is apparent that what caused the change of heart in the 2 months' interval was the fact that the admiral had seen fit to express, with commendable frankness, his deeply felt conviction before a committee of the Congress. There is ground to believe that the manner in which the announcement of the admiral's removal was made—that is, the President made his action known to the press before notifying Admiral Denfeld—was part and parcel of a calculated pattern of intimidation. At any rate, it emphasizes the extent to which the administration may go to slap down those who dare oppose it.

Mr. President, far more is involved here than the scuttling of the career of a single officer, a fine and valuable officer though he may be. The well-being of the Republic is endangered by the dictatorial attitude and actions of the administration. Basically, what is involved is this: Is the Congress to continue as a coordinate branch of the Government, as provided by the Constitution, or will it permit itself to be relegated to the status of the Roman Senate under Diocletian, to the condition of the Estates General under Louis XIV, to the state of the Reichstag under Hitler?

Unless the Congress through its committees is able to obtain factual and unbiased information from the administration, unless the members of the Military Establishment and those of all executive agencies of the Government are permitted to express their opinions without fear of reprisal and recrimination, then Congress cannot obtain the facts it requires. It will no longer be able to legislate wisely. Its functions would be usurped by the executive branch. Representative government, for all practical purposes, would no longer exist in the United States.

Mr. President, Secretary of the Navy Matthews appeared before the Senate Armed Services Committee on January 12. As shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 18, 1950, at page 534, Secretary Matthews summed up his position in the following language:

Secretary MATTHEWS. It is not a matter, in my judgment, as to where he expresses that opinion. The important thing is that he entertains that conviction in opposition to his superior officer.

Admiral Denfeld was purged, then, not because he failed to execute his duty as a member of the armed forces, but because he chose to exercise his prerogative—his precious privilege as an American citizen—to think. There is no evidence indicating that Admiral Denfeld at any time refused or failed to carry out an order from his superiors or to perform his duties to the best of his ability. But because he happened to entertain thoughts at variance with certain of the policies laid down by his superiors, and because he exercised the privilege accorded him by law to inform the Congress of his belief, he was dismissed.

Has the administration instituted a thought-control policy designed to snuff out independent thinking on the part of the members of the armed services?

Do those who dare to entertain thoughts of their own, or to present their honest views when called on to do so by the Congress, face humiliation, degradation, and the loss of their careers?

The administration's program to control the thoughts and to standardize the mental operations of our high-ranking military officers will surely have a profound effect on officials of the other executive agencies. How many of those officials who value their positions and reputations will dare to come before the Congress and testify fully, freely, and frankly when their views are in conflict with policies laid down by the administration?

Mr. President, we should never forget that the Chief Executive of the United States possesses what our forefathers referred to as the "power of the sword." Our forefathers realized the importance of checks on this power if our Republic was to avoid the fate of other nations that have passed into oblivion in the processes of time.

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution provides:

The Congress shall have power * * * to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

Congress alone can declare war.

It is the responsibility of the Congress "to raise and support armies."

In passing the unification law it was not the intention of the Congress to forfeit these constitutional powers to the executive branch of our Government. Indeed, any such action would be a fatal blow to freedom. The liberty of the people depends on the steadfastness with which Congress can impose proper restraints upon him who possesses, for the time being, the "power of the sword" and, incidentally, upon the bureaucrats appointed by him.

Mr. President, the independence, the honor, and the constitutional prerogatives of the Congress have been directly challenged. We want no dictators in this country, either civilian or military. There is no room for them on the free soil of America. Congress must not permit itself to be thwarted and its lawful functions undermined by the executive branch of the Government. The separation of the powers of government provided in the Constitution must remain intact. The Congress must continue to operate as the founding fathers intended. It must persist as a coordinate branch of the Government.

Mr. President, it is unnecessary for me to say that our Committee on Armed Forces has the confidence of this body. I express the hope that two matters of great urgency will receive its prompt attention. I trust the committee will proceed:

First, to investigate and lay before the Senate all of the facts and circumstances connected with the removal of Admiral Denfeld from his post as Chief of Naval Operations. This is the people's business. It involves the national defense, the safety, and security of us all. The people want the facts and are entitled to no less than all the facts.

Second, to bring in, if possible, legislation that will (a) safeguard the right of committees of the Congress to receive the unbiased and uncoerced testimony of members of the armed forces; (b) protect from reprisal and disciplinary action any members of the armed forces—from private to general, from seaman to admiral—who may, in good faith, give testimony before a committee of the Congress not in accord with the ideas entertained for the time being by the administration or their superior officers.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to make a very brief statement for the RECORD. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM] that it is most unfortunate that in attempting to unify the military services the impact which has occurred from the removal of Admiral Denfeld and the nomination of Admiral Sherman to take his place has had such an effect upon the Navy and upon all the military branches of the service.

I voted for the unification bill. I believe in it, and I think the sooner the provisions of the unification law are placed in full operation the sooner there will develop a more efficient and a more economical military service all the way through, and I am satisfied that the results will be most gratifying.

I also feel that it has been rather difficult, possibly, to merge the three military branches. For that reason the impact which I have referred to has been severe. Whether what was done could have been done in some other way, of course, is a matter of opinion. I think it should have been done according to the constitutional processes so ably discussed by the junior Senator from Missouri.

With that preface, Mr. President, let me say that on the showing which has been made I should very much have preferred to have the matter cleared up in the Armed Services Committee, and then to accept or reject the report of the committee in connection with the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman. I shall vote for the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman. In so doing, however, I do not want my vote to be taken as being in any way a criticism of the efficient work done previously by Admiral Denfeld.

I do not know Admiral Sherman. I have met, consulted, and conversed with Admiral Denfeld many times. I always found him to be a very courteous gentleman, and, so far as my contacts with him are concerned, the information he gave me was trustworthy. I believe him, and I think he is a very fine gentleman.

Neither do I want to say, Mr. President, that my vote for the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman enters at all into the discussions had with the Secretary of the Navy. We have, up to this moment, certain allegations presented on the floor of the Senate. As I have said before, I think all that should have been adduced before the Armed Services Committee, with a report by the committee for the Senate to accept or to reject. The charges made relative to the Secretary of the Navy might have been used as possible guideposts in voting for the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman.

Mr. President, as a Nebraskan, I wish to say unqualifiedly, without regard to the charge of incompetency, or to the politics of the situation, that the Secretary of the Navy is a man who is held in unquestioned repute in my State. His veracity, to my knowledge, has never been questioned. He is a fine man and he has a fine family.

I desire the RECORD to show that, as I said in the beginning, as I vote for the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman the question of competency of the Secretary of the Navy does not enter into the question at all. Allegations have been made, but evidence supporting them has not been adduced, and we are not passing upon that question in the vote on the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me say while the impact has been severe, it is the job of the administration to effect and perfect unification. It must be done in order to reduce the amount of money required for our national defense at this time. We need every dollar to provide the best and the most efficient national defense possible. Therefore we must unify the services at all costs.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I congratulate the distinguished minority leader for the fine attitude he takes toward a fellow citizen of his home State. The recommendation which has been given by the distinguished junior Senator from Nebraska coincides with what the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] said only 2 or 3 days ago with respect to Mr. Matthews. I think their attitude is very praiseworthy and I feel that the majority leader should compliment both Senators from Nebraska with respect to the remarks they have made regarding the distinguished Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Matthews. It is especially gratifying that both of the Senators who have spoken so highly regarding the honesty and integrity of Mr. Matthews are Republicans, while Mr. Matthews is a Democrat.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I have a message which I should like to impart to the Senator. I wish to repeat to the Senate a telephone conversation I had this morning with Admiral Denfeld, which I think will be of interest to all Senators. But first I should like briefly to touch upon what came before the Senate yesterday.

Yesterday we were presented with a letter from Matthews in which he stated that the President had removed Admiral Denfeld. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] who, I am sorry to say is not on the floor at this time, submitted certain documents. Today I asked the Senator if those were the only documents dealing with this subject, and he said they were.

Mr. President, I find, surprisingly, that there is nothing in those documents to indicate that the President ever removed Admiral Denfeld.

After discovering that the President had never himself accomplished this removal, I started checking into the legal question of delivery of Admiral Denfeld's commission. That question was raised by Secretary Matthews in his letter to Mr. TYDINGS. The Secretary said that there had never been a legal delivery of the commission, and therefore that Denfeld had never been appointed.

In going over all the available cases, I found the decision rendered by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Marbury against Madison, which I think is directly in point. In that case Chief Justice Marshall said that the signing and the affixing of the seal were sufficient. The Marbury case was an action to obtain possession of a commission. The appointed officer had never been given possession of the commission, and Chief Justice Marshall said that the signing and the affixing of the seal were sufficient without physical delivery.

The President never having removed Admiral Denfeld as Chief of Naval Operations and the commission having been properly issued it would therefore appear that Admiral Denfeld is still Chief of Naval Operations. I therefore took it upon myself to call Admiral Denfeld. I told him that I and a number of other Senators were in a very embarrassing position today. I told him that we either had to vote against the confirmation of Admiral Sherman, a man whom I consider an outstanding officer, or to vote to continue to have no recognized Chief of Naval Operations; that if, on the other hand, we voted for the confirmation of Admiral Sherman, such a vote could be misconstrued in some quarters as an indication that we were placing our stamp of approval upon the very shoddy treatment given to Admiral Denfeld, and it might mean we were placing our stamp of approval upon the method of his dismissal; but, more important still, in the future it might be taken as a precedent for the legal proposition that the President or the Secretary of the Navy, as in this case, could remove at will, and without stating any cause therefor, a statutory officer who had been appointed for a specific term and whose nomination had been confirmed by the Senate.

I told Admiral Denfeld that I was very curious to know what his position was, whether he claims that he is the Chief of Naval Operations or not. He agreed with the statement, without referring to it, made on the floor the other day by several Senators, including the Senator from Massachusetts, that it would be unfortunate for the Navy and for the entire Defense Establishment to continue without a recognized Chief of Naval Operations. He agreed with me that those of us who felt strongly on this legal proposition as to whether or not there was actually a vacancy were in an unusual position. He did, however, wish to discuss that legal proposition. He told me, however, that in order to remove any doubt, he is now resigning as Chief of Naval Operations, so that the Senate may freely vote on the confirmation of Admiral Sherman. He also told me that he considered Admiral Sherman to be an outstanding naval officer, and that in his opinion he would make an exceedingly able Chief of Naval Operations. Admiral Denfeld did not give me this message for formal transmission to the Senate. He is not in a position to do that. However, I am sure that he would have no objection whatever to my telling the Senate, first, that he is going to resign as Chief of Naval Operations, so that there will be no doubt whatsoever about a vacancy in the Office; and, second, that he considers Admiral Sherman to be a highly qualified officer for the position to which he has been nominated.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Keeping in mind the discussion which took place yesterday, to the effect that the Commander in Chief, the President of the United States, under the Constitution has the power to remove a military officer and to make changes in the Military Establishment, does the Senator not also have in mind that even that power of the President has certain limitations placed upon it, namely, that an officer cannot be thrown out of the Army, for instance, without having an opportunity to appear before a court martial, or a board where his case may be outlined, and that an enlisted man cannot be summarily removed from the service without being given the opportunity to present his case? While no restrictions are placed on the President of the United States in exercising his constitutional power as Commander in Chief, there is a proper way in which that should be done, and unless that proper method is followed, the Unification Act, which sets up the Joint Chiefs of Staff, might itself be placed in jeopardy. Has the Senator gone into that phase of the matter at all?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, to a considerable extent. I had not planned to discuss it, but the Senator is 100 percent correct. Let us take the case of a second lieutenant in the Army. The President cannot remove him. He can suspend him and order a court martial. There the young officer has a right to defend himself, and the charges against him must be proved. That is the procedure up and down the line, and I think it is doubly applicable to a situation involving officers whose nominations must be confirmed by the Senate. Of course, the appointment of every commissioned officer must be confirmed by the Senate. However, in this case an officer was confirmed by the Senate to hold an office for a specific period of time, and the Secretary of the Navy obviously did not have the power to remove him, as he did. It must be understood that the President did not remove him, even though Mr. Matthews so indicates in his letter. When I say that, Mr. President, I am assuming that the Senator from Maryland has submitted all the documents on this matter. I have no personal investigation for such documents.

Returning to the letter of Secretary Matthews, let me say that I have had some experience as a lawyer, I have had some experience as a judge, and while I was in the service, between combat tours, I had considerable experience in representing men in my unit before courts martial. I am firmly convinced that the President could not in this case remove Admiral Denfeld in the manner in which Mr. Matthews indicated the President had removed him. That is one of the reasons I am happy that Admiral Denfeld has said he is resigning, in order to clear up the matter. I believe it is very important to have it clear in the RECORD at this time—and I am sure other Senators feel the same way—that we are not establishing any legal precedent, which might in the future be misconstrued, giving the President a power which many of us believe he does not possess.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an additional question?

Mr. McCARTHY. Certainly.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Keeping in mind the Unification Act, which sets up the Joint Chiefs and provides for their confirmation by the Senate, and now the chairman of the Joint Chiefs, who is also subject to confirmation by the Senate, certainly there must be some limitations meant by the Congress, so that any removal at least would follow an orderly procedure. I think a person can maintain that position without in any way questioning the ultimate legal authority of the President to make a change. But I believe it certainly is indicated that changes should not be made haphazardly, and certainly not without giving the officer involved an opportunity at least to present his side of the case, which is the customary practice.

The President could even suspend, I rather assume, either the chairman of the Joint Chiefs——

Mr. McCARTHY. I think he could do that.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Or the Chief of Naval Operations, or the Chief of Staff of the Air Forces, or the Chief of Staff of the Army, temporarily relieve him from his duties, and then set in motion whatever the proper procedure would be to create a vacancy. But it seems to me that in view of the fact that the Congress provided that those appointed to these positions should be subject to Senate confirmation, and also in view of the fact that, for instance, the Joint Chiefs, and in some cases the Chiefs themselves, serve on other bodies, such as the War Council, there are of necessity certain restrictions which should surround the position an appointee to which has to be confirmed by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, in my opinion that is the best legal statement of the situation I have ever heard, either by a lawyer or a nonlawyer—and I understand the Senator from California is not a lawyer. I think he would make a good one.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WITHERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to address a question to the distinguished Senator in order to make the situation a little clearer in the RECORD. Is it now the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin that Admiral Denfeld, rather than to rely upon any legal question, and in the interest of the Navy and the interest of the Nation, lays no claim whatever to occupying at this time the post of Chief of Naval Operations?

Mr. McCARTHY. He is ready to submit his formal resignation.

Mr. HOLLAND. Pursuing the matter further by an additional question, it seems to me that two different things are mentioned in the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin. One, the intention to make a resignation effective, and the other, the question of laying no claim at this time to occupancy of the office. I was strongly hopeful that the Senator would be able to say to the Senate that the distinguished naval officer, Admiral Denfeld, now lays no claim whatever to the post by reason of the fact that he does not desire to rely upon mere legal questions, and does place the good of the Navy and the good of the Nation first, and for those reasons has decided to advise the Senate that he lays no claim whatsoever at this time to occupancy of the distinguished office.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not sure that I follow the Senator. The Senator understands that Admiral Denfeld, so far as I know, is not a lawyer. I would not under any circumstances ask him to pass upon such an involved constitutional question. The courts have differed upon such questions. For example, in the decision in the Humphrey case, the Court stated that there remains an area in which there is doubt, which is left to the future for legal decision. Admiral Denfeld's case may be in that area.

I would not ask the admiral to pass upon that legal question. When he says, in order to leave no questions in the minds of any Senators, "I am submitting my resignation," that is certainly all he could possibly do.

I may say that if Admiral Denfeld had tried to give me a legal opinion—which he did not—as to whether he is legally Chief of Naval Operations as of today, I would not have transmitted that to the Senate, because I do not think the admiral has the legal background which qualifies him to answer that technical, involved constitutional question.

Mr. President, in view of the decision in the case of Marbury v. Madison, which holds that when a commission is signed and sealed the appointment has been accomplished, in view of the fact that the President has not taken any action whatsoever—the Senator understands that I qualify this by saying I am relying upon the documents submitted by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]—in view of the fact that the President took no action whatsoever except in his memo of October 22, in which he said to the Secretary of the Navy, "I accordingly hereby authorize you to arrange for and carry out the transfer which you recommend," in which memorandum he does not refer to Admiral Denfeld (but is a part of a sequence of documents, which may indicate that he had Admiral Denfeld in mind); and, plus the fact that the Secretary of the Navy does not have the power of removal, as of this moment Admiral Denfeld is Chief of Naval Operations.

Therefore I think we owe Admiral Denfeld a deep vote of thanks for saying, "So far as I am concerned I am going to create a vacancy so the Senate may act on Admiral Sherman's nomination. I am submitting my resignation." That is certainly a highly patriotic thing for him to do. Then he goes further and says, "I think the new appointee whose nomination you are considering, Admiral Sherman, is an outstanding naval officer, and I believe he will do an excellent job as Chief of Naval Operations." There is most certainly nothing more that anyone could ask of Admiral Denfeld after the very shabby treatment he has received.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield to the Senator from Missouri, unless the Senator from Florida has not completed his questioning.

Mr. HOLLAND. I had another question, but that is all right.

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DONNELL. The Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] inquired whether or not the Senator from Wisconsin is stating that Admiral Denfeld lays no claim to the office. Does the Senator from Wisconsin understand that whether or not Admiral Denfeld lays claim to the office is determinative of the legal situation, of the right of the President to nominate Admiral Sherman? Let me perhaps clarify the question a little.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think I understand it.

Mr. DONNELL. If at the time the nomination was made by the President there was no vacancy, can Admiral Denfeld now, weeks or months after the nomination was made, come forward and, by laying no claim to the office, make valid a nomination which, I take it, in the opinion of the Senator from Wisconsin, was void at the time it was made?

Mr. McCARTHY. I would not agree with the Senator from Missouri on that. Let us go back a step. Many times in the past we have confirmed men for positions in which there was presently no vacancy. The confirmations were to take effect at some future time. For example, when the Senate confirmed Admiral Denfeld on August 15, we confirmed him for a term starting December 15. I think we could have confirmed Admiral Sherman, or any other admiral, on August 15, for a term that was to commence on December 15.

Now, I sincerely hope that the waters are not muddied by the issuance of a commission dated prior to Admiral Denfeld's resignation. We have the situation cleared up now, and I sincerely hope that Admiral Sherman will not be sworn prior to Admiral Denfeld's resignation.

I repeat: I think that regardless of whether there was a vacancy at the time the President made the nomination we can confirm now that we know there will be a vacancy in the very imminent future.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. What the Senator from Wisconsin is saying in substance is that Admiral Denfeld says he is no lawyer, he does not know the effect of his resignation, but in the interest of clarifying the whole situation, in the interest of the country, and of the Navy, he is submitting his resignation for what that piece of paper may be worth. Is not that the situation? He does not claim to go into the legal effect of his resignation at this time; he simply submits it in order to make the situation perfectly clear?

Mr. McCARTHY. I may say I recited to Admiral Denfeld the statement which the Senator from Massachusetts made on the floor of the Senate yesterday, the position which the Senator took that we should have a Chief of Naval Operations, and that is how Admiral Denfeld feels also. I think I have answered the Senator's question.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. It will be necessary for me to make a brief statement prior to the phrasing of my question. I am not disturbed by the question which seems to be disturbing the Senator from Wisconsin. I do not believe that there is a situation under which there is a question as to whether a vacancy existed at the time of this appointment. It seems to me that this is the situation: We are concerned with two terms of office, one of which would have expired on December 15, and a new one which would have begun on December 15 for a term of 4 years. At the time of the appointment of the successor, Admiral Sherman, on November 2, the opinion of the Judge Advocate General of the Navy shows two ample reasons, in my judgment, for his finding that the post was then vacant, and that the appointment was a valid appointment at that time, because, first, by citing the law and the authorities he makes it perfectly clear that the President was given, by a specific law, the right of removal, and that he exercised that right, and, secondly, he calls attention to the constitutional aspects of the situation under which the President as Commander in Chief has the complete right at any time, by change of the assignment of the officer in question, to accomplish the same result, that is the vacation of his office as Chief of Naval Operations.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let me interrupt the Senator at that point.

Mr. HOLLAND. Please let me finish.

Mr. McCARTHY. Very well. I am sorry.

Mr. HOLLAND. Then the Judge Advocate General very tersely, and, I think, successfully, finds that on both grounds he feels that a vacancy existed, and that the interim appointment of November 2 was a valid one.

The other question that comes up has to do with the term of office.

I have read the record carefully. The question has to do with the term of office which would have begun on December 15 of last year under the appointment made by the President, as sent to the Senate and confirmed far ahead of time. It appears that a commission was issued and irregularly delivered, but whether regularly or irregularly delivered, was not accepted. There is no showing of acceptance in the record, no showing of the taking of the oath. There is no showing that anything that transpired did transpire on December 15, but long prior thereto, long prior to the date when that particular appointment for that particular term could have begun and could have been effective.

I fail to find in the RECORD—and I reread it very carefully this morning—anything that even remotely indicates that that particular commission could have become effective, or the appointment under it could have become effective, or the term could have ever begun. So there is nothing to indicate that Admiral Denfeld was there in the office or anywhere about it at that time, that he accepted the appointment as of that date, that he took the oath of office as of that date, or that the term ever began to run; but the record shows quite clearly and to the contrary that the interim appointment to another, to Admiral Sherman, was made back on November 2, was then in force and was operative, and that that interim appointee was in possession of the office and was serving in it on that date, and that there has been no claim whatever on the part of Admiral Denfeld to the occupancy of that office, and no physical occupancy of it since that time, and, in short, no showing whatever that that term ever validly began.

So that now we have before us only the new appointment, which was sent to the Senate by the President on January 5 for a new term of 4 years of the new appointee, Admiral Sherman. So, I am not laboring under any disturbance whatsoever from the question suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The reason for my prior questions is this: I thought that it would be entirely conclusive of the whole matter to have the record clearly show, as I understand is the case, though the Senator has used, I think, confusing words in stating that fact to the Senate, that at this time Admiral Denfeld makes no claim whatever to occupancy of the office, and is erasing himself informally from any position where he might disturb the situation or take a position contrary to the welfare of the Navy or the welfare of the Nation. I think that such a statement would clearly and conclusively clear the deck and clear the record so that there could be no possible feeling that there is any handicap now existing or any obstruction to prevent the early—and I hope it will be early—confirmation of the distinguished officer who succeeds Admiral Denfeld. Both these officers are of such distinction and such patriotic character, and the Nation has so clearly been well served by both of them, and the earlier appointee now removes himself from the picture so graciously, as I understand, that I think it is a pity even further to continue the discussion of something on which there is no difference between the officers, no difference of opinion among us here as to the issue as to how we can best serve the interests of the Navy and the interests of the Nation.

So my question would be this: Is the Senator from Wisconsin now in effect stating to the Senate that, by whatever term he may call it, the distinguished former occupant of the position of Chief of Naval Operation, Admiral Denfeld, is, through the Senator from Wisconsin, advising the Senate that he does not wish longer to hold up in any way or obstruct consideration and confirmation of the appointment of his successor, Admiral Sherman, for whom he has the highest regard, and that he is taking whatever means are necessary immediately to remove himself from the field, and to make it clear that under no circumstances does he want to be regarded as obstructing the immediate confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman? Is that the position of Admiral Denfeld?

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator has stated some facts. He said that the Judge Advocate General stated that the President has the authority to remove, and the Senator said that in view of the fact that the President did remove Admiral Denfeld, he was not in office. I point out that that is not the factual situation in which we find ourselves. We have Secretary Matthews' statement that the President removed Admiral Denfeld. However, yesterday the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] submitted certain documents. I asked him earlier today whether those were the only documents available on this subject. He said they were. Those documents indicate that the President never did take that action. Of course, I agree that we are now discussing a moot question. The Senator says we can confirm the nomination of Admiral Sherman because there is, and has been, a vacancy. I say I intend to vote for the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman because Admiral Denfeld, by his action, is creating a vacancy.

But in order that the record may be clear in regard to the type of information Secretary Matthews is giving us, let us have it understood that there is nothing whatsoever in the record today to show that the President ever did remove Admiral Denfeld. The only document on that subject—and I shall read all of it, because it is short—reads as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., October 27, 1949.

Memorandum for: The Secretary of the Navy, from the President.

Over a long period of time I have devoted considerable thought to various aspects of the problem which you discuss in your letter of today's date.

So as to make the situation clear, let me point out that the Secretary had written the President on that date, saying that he would like to remove Admiral Denfeld. How many other letters he wrote to the President on that day, I do not know.

The President further said:

The action which you recommend meets with my approval.

Accordingly, I hereby authorize you to arrange for and carry out the transfer which you recommend.

So far as we know, the President never even affixed his name to any document saying that Admiral Denfeld was removed from that office. In the document which is produced, he does not mention the position of Chief of Naval Operations; neither does he mention Admiral Denfeld's name. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, there is nothing in the document to show that the President even attempted to remove Admiral Denfeld.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the Senator has taken Secretary Matthews' unsupported statement, when the Senator says the commission was delivered irregularly. I do not know where the Senator gets his information as to what regular delivery is. My thought is that when a document which the President has signed, which the Secretary of the Navy has signed, and which the Secretary of the Navy has sealed, is taken by the President's naval aide to Admiral Denfeld, who is told, "Here is your commission," and then when the Admiral walks into the office of the Secretary of the Navy and says to him, "I have it. Thanks very much," I do not think we can ask for a more complete legal delivery.

I do not think the Senator from Florida is aware of another fact, namely, that the present law provides for a term of office of not less than 4 years for the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. When I state the period for which the other members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff were appointed, I am relying upon my memory. I understand that both the other two members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff have been appointed for a 4-year term. However, Admiral Denfeld had previously been appointed for a 2-year term, and the second commission merely extended his term for an additional period of 2 years, so as to make his full term equal to those of the other two members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Whether Admiral Denfeld had to be resworn, I do not know. I think that is a question which the committee should have determined; but, again, it is moot, in view of the fact that Admiral Denfeld is resigning. On that question, I have talked to a number of naval officers of the highest rank available to me. Their opinion differs. Most of them say there is no necessity for a new swearing in, in view of the fact that the commission merely extends the term for which he was originally sworn in. One felt that he had to be resworn.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I merely wish to say that I understand that when such an officer has his term of service extended, it is not customary for him to be sworn again.

Mr. McCARTHY. That seems to be the consensus of opinion among the officers I have contacted, but I may say there is a difference of opinion.

So, Mr. President, now we are discussing a moot question. I agree that with Admiral Denfeld saying, "I am going to file my formal resignation," I now can freely vote for confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman, who is a competent officer.

The Senator says he can vote for confirmation of his nomination because the Secretary of the Navy effectively removed his predecessor. At least, we agree on the end result.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield to the Senator from Florida for a question.

Mr. HOLLAND. Regardless of the fact that I do not at all agree with the Senator from Wisconsin as to the reasons for his position, I compliment him upon that decision. I hope the Senate may now vote, without further delay, upon confirmation of the nomination of a patriotic American to be Chief of Naval Operations, so that this question may become a matter of history, and so that we can proceed to consider other important matters which are pending.

Mr. McCARTHY. Is that a question?

Mr. President, although this disposes of the very important question of confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman to be Chief of Naval Operations, yet there is another matter which during all this discussion I have considered to be of infinitely more importance, a subject which I am afraid has been hidden under the more spectacular developments.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield for a question.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Would the Senator from Wisconsin agree to permit the nomination of Admiral Sherman to be confirmed, without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. McCARTHY. I prefer to proceed with the discussion.

Mr. President, there is a matter of considerably more importance which is tied into the subject of confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman. I intend to discuss that question at this time. I shall do so very briefly. I share with the two Senators who have just suggested that the Senate speedily confirm the nomination of Admiral Sherman, their sentiments that his nomination should be confirmed. However, whether that is done at this moment or 5 minutes from now does not concern me greatly. For that reason, I intend to discuss this matter, which I consider to be of the utmost importance.

Mr. President, the Secretary of the Navy appeared before the Armed Services Committee. At that appearance, he misstated the facts. As to that, there can be no question. Later, when his erroneous statements were disclosed, a sizable number of the members of the Armed Services Committee—all the members on this side of the aisle, I believe—said that with those new facts at hand, they would like to have the Secretary appear again before the committee, and would like to question him and find out why the committee was misinformed by him. When that statement was made by those members of the committee, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee saw fit to conduct his own personal investigation, chiefly by obtaining a letter from Secretary Matthews. That letter was presented yesterday on the floor of the Senate. In the letter we find that, again, the Secretary of the Navy misinforms the Senate. In the letter he said, in effect, "I signed the document. It went to the President. Then someone delivered it, without authorization, to Admiral Denfeld. I never knew Admiral Denfeld got it. Normally it would not go directly to Admiral Denfeld; it would come back to my office, and have the seal affixed thereon. But that was not done in this case."

Again, Mr. President, documents speak much louder than words. So we presented the document, and it showed that the seal was regularly affixed to it, and that, again, the Secretary of the Navy was in error.

The Secretary of the Navy requested an opinion from the Judge Advocate General as to whether or not the President could remove Admiral Denfeld. I assume he informed the Judge Advocate General that the President had attempted to accomplish removal of Admiral Denfeld. Again the Secretary of the Navy was in error; for, if we examine the documents which the Senator from Maryland has given us, we find that at no time did the President take any steps to remove Admiral Denfeld. We find that the only thing which might even remotely be interpreted as indication of an attempt to remove Admiral Denfeld is a document in which neither Admiral Denfeld's name nor the post of Chief of Naval Operations is mentioned.

Although I do not consider to be the most important question before the Senate the question of whether Secretary Matthews is deliberately attempting to deceive the Senate or is so incompetent that he does not know what he is doing, yet of course that is an important question. However, I think it is of infinitely more importance for us to consider the Johnson-Matthews recently imposed rule of secrecy, as to which Secretary Matthews said—and I think his is the most fantastic statement I have ever known a Cabinet officer to make—that if any military officer told the Congress the truth, and the whole truth—I do not attempt to quote the statement exactly until I can find that point in the record—he would have to take the consequences. If that is not an attempted intimidation of every prospective witness from the military who will ever appear before any committee, then my legal interpretation of "intimidation" is entirely wrong. He does not stop there but demonstrates very clearly what the consequences are. The consequences are humiliation, embarrassment, and transfer to the Siberia of an unimportant position, a position far below the rank of the officer who may be affected. If the Senate and the House of Representatives, constituting the Congress, do nothing about it, it means that we of the Congress place our stamp of approval upon the rule that never again can the officers of the military come before committees to tell the truth. It means we are placing our stamp of approval upon perjury, Mr. President, if you please. It means that if a witness from the military comes before a committee, is sworn as a witness, is asked questions, and tells what he believes the facts to be; if he makes recommendations which he thinks properly should be made, then, as the Secretary of the Navy said, he must suffer the consequences. We have known what the consequences have been to three of the five naval officers who testified.

Mr. President, if the Senate had the right to impeach, I would suggest that impeachment proceedings against Mr. Matthews be instituted. The Senate, however, does not have that right. If the Senate had that right, I would suggest that he be impeached on four separate grounds:

First. Untruthfulness before the committee.

Second. Being completely incompetent to perform the duties of Secretary of the Navy.

I may point out that I do not think Matthews can be blamed too much for being an incompetent man and for his inability to perform his job. The blame must rest upon the appointing power.

Third. His complete disloyalty to the branch of the service for which he should be fighting. This is something for which the Secretary himself can be blamed. Why this disloyalty to the Navy, I do not know, but apparently he thinks he does not have the support from the naval officers which he should have. This is not surprising. When a man is placed in that position, with no experience whatever, and shortly afterward he comes before a Senate committee and says, in effect, "I am the great naval strategist, and if any one of the admirals, who have served for 30 or 40 years, disagrees with me"—he does not even say they must state their disagreement; he says the important thing is—and I quote him—

> The important thing is that he entertains a conviction in opposition to mine.

With a Secretary of the Navy who knows nothing about naval affairs saying that of men who have devoted their entire lives to the naval service, and when he says to them, "If you entertain an idea different from mine, then you will suffer the consequences," it is not surprising that he cannot command any loyalty from those men.

Fourth. The new and dangerous rule which the Secretary is enforcing—the rule that if anyone appears before a Senate committee and tells the truth, he must take the consequences. Let me read it into the RECORD again. It appears on page 111 of his testimony given on January 12. He starts out by saying:

> The individual should have not only the right but the duty to testify, to be absolutely sure that he will not suffer any reprisal by so doing.

So far so good. He then says:

> But I also think that when a member of the Military Establishment does that, that he must be prepared to, in a sense, take the consequences.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will unanimously confirm the nomination of Admiral Sherman for the position of Chief of Naval Operations.

Mr. CAIN rose.

Mr. McCARTHY. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination?

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I have not yielded the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. McCARTHY. I yielded to the Senator from Washington for a question.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I think it is safe to say that the Senator from Wisconsin has disturbed probably every other Senator on the floor of the Senate by the character of what he has said and the charges which he individually thinks should be preferred against the Secretary of the Navy. The Senator from Wisconsin is aware of the fact that the minority members of the Armed Services Committee have requested of the chairman that the committee hold a hearing, at which time Secretary Matthews would be encouraged to come before the committee to speak for himself. If there is to be such a meeting, I wonder whether the Senator from Wisconsin would be inclined, on the assumption that the hearing was thorough and conclusive, to be guided by the verdict which the committee might reach with reference to the degree of guilt, if any, of the Secretary of the Navy. That is to say, would the Senator from Wisconsin, even at this late day, think it both proper and imperatively important that the Secretary of the Navy be called before the Armed Services Committee in order that there may be a most thorough exploration into every one of the serious contradictions which the Senator from Wisconsin has pointed out so ably in recent days?

Mr. McCARTHY. I may say I heartily agree with the minority members of the Armed Services Committee, who said, "Let us have Secretary Matthews come before the committee; let us get the truth."

I may say this. The Senator has used the word guilt. I have tried to make it clear that I do not think the Secretary, in his mind, was lying. I think in order to constitute a lie a person must know that what he is saying is untrue. Frankly, I think that in the tremendous task which has fallen into the lap of the Secretary, he does not remember from day to day what he has done. Frankly, I do not think he knew he had signed the document, when in the record he says, "I was the man who advised the President not to sign." I think he thought he had so advised the President. I believe he felt that in some of those documents he had so advised the President. I think, for example, when the Secretary says that "If any naval officer differs with me in any respect, or entertains a difference in his mind, then his head must fall," he feels he is doing right.

The Secretary apparently does not realize that some of the great naval officers know more about the Navy than he does. That cannot be labeled guilt. A man cannot be said to be guilty of being incompetent, in the criminal sense of the word. I think Mr. Matthews would like to be a great Secretary of the Navy.

As I have said, when I found this unusual document, and these unusual statements, I talked to both Senators from Nebraska. I inquired what kind of man Matthews was. Both Senators had the finest things to say about his reputation and about his truthfulness. I did not question them about his competence to act as Secretary of the Navy. I took the trouble to call several of my personal friends in Omaha, none of whom had anything but the finest things to say about Mr. Matthews. I therefore wish to make it clear that when I refer to impeachment, I am not concerned about establishing that the man is guilty of any crime; I merely think he is so incompetent he should not be holding the job. I think the President was very unkind to him when he appointed him to that task, and I hope that very soon the President will find some other task for him.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. I should like to say to my friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, that I think he has made himself perfectly clear in recent days. One thing of which I have in mind is whether the matter concerning the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Matthews, should stop here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington desire to be recognized in order to make a speech?

Mr. CAIN. I was merely laying the foundation for a question. I should like to think that we would not leave the matter concerning the Secretary of the Navy dangling, and never resolve the serious charges preferred by the Senator from Wisconsin. Against that feeling, I wonder whether the Senator from Wisconsin thinks it would be both a service to the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Matthews, and to the country at large, if the Armed Services Committee of the Senate were to agree to call Mr. Matthews before it, to give him an adequate and full opportunity to speak for himself, and to explain, if he can, the contradictions which the Senator from Wisconsin has pointed out, and which the Secretary of the Navy himself wrote into the record when he last appeared before the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let me first say, the Senator refers to charges made by the Senator from Wisconsin. The Senator does not recall that he has made any charges. The Senator from Wisconsin disclosed facts. I stand corrected—I have made the charge that the facts prove the man to be either untruthful or incompetent. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did make that charge. The remainder of the matters I have brought before the Senate have merely been in the nature of disclosures of facts.

Second, in answer to the Senator's question as to whether I think there should be an investigation by the Armed Services Committee, I answer "Yes."

Mr. CAIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question and a very brief statement?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I am not here to attack the veracity of Secretary Matthews. I personally believe he intends and wants to tell us the truth. He was not under oath when he made any statements before the Armed Services Committee. He stated at that time that he would be glad to tell the committee, in executive session, any of the facts concerning Admiral Denfeld's relief from duty, if the committee so desired. I personally agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that the Committee on Armed Services should have had an opportunity to hear Mr. Matthews' statement, in the first place. But that is water over the dam. It is my inference, from what the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] said yesterday, that there will be an opportunity for the Armed Services Committee to discuss the question with Mr. Matthews, and I personally hope that opportunity will come very soon. At that time and after it we can better determine whether the very serious statements which the Senator from Wisconsin has made have any background in fact.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I shall not attempt at this time to make any answer to the serious charges incorporated in the statement of the distinguished junior Senator from Wisconsin. I will say that I have not been one of those who have excoriated the junior Senator from Wisconsin. I think he has a right to say, within reason, what he wishes to say. But I do call attention to the fact at this time that I think it is highly improper for a Member of the Senate who, in the event of impeachment, would sit as a judge, to assume to say what should be done, what sort of proceedings should be initiated, and what sort of charges should be brought by the other House of Congress, which, under the Constitution, is the only one which can originate charges of impeachment——

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is the House which must vote impeachment proceedings and not the Senate.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the Senator is not accurate in his statement. The House has the power to initiate impeachment proceedings and to bring articles of impeachment, but the Senate sits as a court upon those articles of impeachment.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator from Florida is correct in his statement.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I simply want to read for the RECORD one paragraph from the very able statement made by the Judge Advocate General of the Navy, which, it seems to me, completely disposes of the technical questions which have been brought into the matter and which I now understand are entirely out of the discussion, due to the position taken by Admiral Denfeld.

The paragraph to which I have referred is as follows:

> It is obvious that when the President directed Admiral Denfeld's removal from the Office of Chief of Naval Operations early in November 1949, he did not intend Admiral Denfeld to become invested with the office for the second term, and it is equally obvious that Admiral Denfeld understood that. So far as I know, Admiral Denfeld has not asserted claim to it, and even if he had, the circumstances of Admiral Sherman's ad interim appointment and the expressed desires of the President would have prevented.

It seems to me to be thoroughly clear that the term which would have begun on December 15 has never begun and that the Senate is completely within its rights in now acting upon the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman, that I hope the Senate will now confirm the nomination of this distinguished naval hero.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Admiral Forrest P. Sherman to be Chief of Naval Operations?

The nomination was confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nomination.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of legislative business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Swanson, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4692) to provide for the extension of the term of certain patents of persons who served in the military or naval forces of the United States during World War II; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. BRYSON, Mr. WILLIS, and Mr. BOGGS of Delaware were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 25) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, Senate Joint Resolution 25 has been before the Senate, in some form, since December 1923. While designed to meet a very real situation, this proposal, in my judgment, would not hasten the day of a real and constructive solution of the problem the amendment purports to solve. Rather the proposed constitutional amendment would add only confusion and uncertainty to the achievements we have already made in the area of equal rights for women.

Full and vigorous opposition to this amendment is offered, as we all know, by large numbers of women including the leaders of a good portion of our 17,000,000 working women—a sizable group of whom are in the trade-unions. In addition, Mr. William Green of the American Federation of Labor and Mr. Philip Murray, president of the Congress of Industrial Organizations are opposed to this amendment. Moreover, many legal scholars and lawyers who have submitted this proposal to careful scrutiny have concluded that it is not a sound method of eliminating discriminatory treatment of women, and that it would interfere drastically with long-established and accepted family, property, and other relationships.

Everyone in the United States who understands what democracy is, is in favor of equality of economic, legal, and political opportunity for women. The proponents of this joint resolution seek the same ends that we all seek. The only question is how to arrive at a common objective.

A few years ago a distinguished Secretary of Labor, herself a woman, Frances Perkins, defined the proposal set forth in this amendment in the following words:

> The proponents make the serious mistake of attempting to operate on the delicate and complex structure of family, property, and other laws with the bludgeon of an amendment instead of the scalpel of specific corrective legislation.

We have come a long way since the day when the great lawyer, Blackstone, said, "The husband and wife are one, and that one is the husband." Enacted on the statute books of my own State of New York there is, as in other States, an imposing list of statutes for the protection of wives and mothers, widows, and working women.

In New York State a partial list would include legislation for workingwomen such as minimum wages, maximum hours of work, meal periods, night work, industrial housework, and employment of women before and after childbirth. That list also includes much legislation for protection of wives, mothers, and widows, such as the right to protection through legal separation when the husband neglects or refuses proper support. It also includes many divorce and alimony laws.

I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to include at this point in my remarks a partial list of the New York State laws specifically aimed at the protection of women.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I. For wives and mothers:

The husband's primary legal obligation to support his family (common-law rule).

Security for support required from the husband for the wife when he annuls the marriage because of her insanity (Cahill's Consolidated Laws, 1930, ch. 14, sec. 7; supp., 1936, ch. 14, sec. 7-a).

Right to protection through legal separation when the husband neglects or refuses proper support (Civil Practice Act, sec. 1161).

Age of consent to marriage lower for females (Cahill's Consolidated Laws, 1930, ch. 14, sec. 15; supp., 1931-35, ch. 14, sec. 15).

II. For widows:

Right of the widow to occupy rent-free for a 40-day period her husband's dwelling; also, to have her living expenses for that period from the estate (Cahill's Consolidated Laws, 1930, ch. 51, sec. 204).

Continuance of the husband's homestead exemption to his widow for her lifetime (Civil Practice Act, sec. 674).

III. For working women:

Hours of work: 8 a day, 48 a week (Consolidated Laws (Cahill), 1930, ch. 32, sec. 173; Cumulative Supplement, 1931-35, ch. 32, sec. 172; Session Laws: 1937, chs. 281, 282, 283, 660; 1938, ch. 651; 1939, ch. 499; 1940, ch. 216; 1941, ch. 33; 1942, chs. 778, 554 (art. 8); 1943, chs. 171, 315; 1944, ch. 412).

Day of rest (for men also) (Session Laws, 1941, ch. 281).

Meal period (for men also) (Session Laws, 1937, chs. 84, 283).

Night work (Consolidated Laws (Cahill), 1930, ch. 32, secs. 172, 172 (2); Session Laws: 1937, chs. 281, 282, 283; 1938, ch. 651; 1939, ch. 499; 1940, ch. 216; 1942, ch. 778).

Providing seats (Consolidated Code (Cahill), 1930, ch. 32, secs. 2, 150).

Prohibitory: In or in connection with a mine or quarry (ibid., ch. 32, sec. 146 (6)); conductors or guards on any type of railroad (for females under 21) (ibid., sec. 146 (9)); messenger for telegraph or messenger company (for females under 21) (ibid., sec. 146 (10)).

Lifting or carrying heavy weights (ibid., ch. 32, secs. 383, 146 (7), 147; Session Laws, 1938, ch. 657; Department of Labor, Industrial Code, rule No. 10 (1942)).

Equal pay (Session Laws, 1944, ch. 793).

Minimum wage (for men also) (Consolidated Laws (Cahill), supp., 1937, ch. 32, secs. 550-566; Session Laws; 1939, chs. 244, 499; 1942, ch. 693; 1944, ch. 792).

Industrial homework (Consolidated Laws (Cahill), supp., 1931-35, ch. 32, arts. 4, 5, and 13, secs. 350-363; Session Laws: 1940, chs. 386, 422; 1942, ch. 659; Department of Labor, homework orders, 1-4).

Employment before and after childbirth (Consolidated Laws (Cahill), 1930, ch. 32, sec. 148).

Mr. LEHMAN. These laws—which I repeat are only partial in coverage—took into account the differences between men and women in physique and function, and also the difference in the situations in which women find themselves today because of historical limitations and restrictions. These achievements on State legislation are good, but they were not made without great struggle and effort. I would not wish to see that effort, to which I was happy to contribute my share in the past, put to naught or jeopardized, however well-meaning the objective.

But there still remain in our country some discriminatory practices toward women. Some of these discriminations are found in the common law and in some State statutes. However, the most important and significant discriminations are the result of practices and traditions that are not touched by this amendment. Therefore, it seems to me wise to establish a general policy as to equality for women, and then proceed to an orderly study of the status of women. Thus, we could determine what specific changes are actually necessary to achieve equality, rather than impose, as we would by this amendment, an identity of treatment under a masculine pattern.

Such a plan of action was embodied in the women's status bill which was considered by the Congress in 1948. This measure sought to establish as the declared policy of the United States that there should be no distinctions on the basis of sex except such as are reasonably justified by differences of physical structure and biological or social function.

That bill also provided for an investigation and review of the economic, civil, social and political status of women, and the nature and extent of discriminations based on sex throughout the United States.

Some of these provisions are included in the Kefauver proposal, in whose sponsorship I have joined, and which is pending before the Senate today. I hope the Senate will approve that measure.

In conclusion, I am against Senate Joint Resolution 25 for two reasons. One, I do not think it is an effective way to eliminate these discriminations against women which we all deplore; and two, I think its enactment would weaken if not wipe out existing protective labor and social legislation. Congressional approval of Senate Joint Resolution 25 would be a major step backward on the road we are taking toward that aspect of social justice which demands safeguards for the health and well-being of women workers. Such action by Congress—if our vote were followed by the State legislatures—would also result in a vast confusion of rights and duties already defined in existing State laws in the field of family relations and property—thus provoking unlimited litigation.

I am for equal rights for women. I shall continue to work for them. But I am strongly of the opinion that Senate Joint Resolution 25, far from assuring these rights, will hinder the orderly attainment of them.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. LEHMAN. I yield.

Mr. IVES. The senior Senator from New York wishes to concur with the observations of the junior Senator from New York in connection with the desirability of making certain that the statutes which now exist in the several States for the purpose of protecting women would be in no way harmed, injured, or eliminated by any constitutional amendment of the type now before the Senate.

However, the senior Senator from New York would like to inquire of the junior Senator from New York if he thinks there is any possibility that the amendment which has been proposed by the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] would meet the problem which has just been cited by the junior Senator from New York. The proposed amendment reads as follows:

On page 2, between lines 4 and 5, insert the following:

"The provisions of this article shall not be construed to impair any rights, benefits, or exemptions conferred by law upon persons of the female sex."

Mr. LEHMAN. My opinion is that it would, of course, strengthen Senate Joint Resolution 25, in that it would add a declaration of intention. At the same time, I have been told by many lawyers, and by some judges, that even the inclusion of an amendment of this character would not assure a safeguarding of the great code of social and labor legislation which the senior Senator from New York and I had a part in setting up in our State of New York.

Mr. IVES. We certainly have.

Mr. LEHMAN. I believe the adoption of such an amendment to the proposal as that suggested by the Senator from Arizona would open the way to an endless amount of litigation, the outcome of which, obviously, would be in doubt.

Mr. IVES. There is one more question I should like to ask the distinguished junior Senator from New York. Does he feel that it would be possible to formulate an amendment along the lines proposed by the distinguished senior Senator from Arizona which in and of itself would be sufficient to meet the problem which the junior Senator from New York has cited?

Mr. LEHMAN. I do not think it would be possible to do it in the case of a constitutional amendment. I believe a great many of the purposes of the amendment could be gained by the enactment by the Congress of the United States of the bill which was introduced yesterday by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER].

Mr. IVES. I thank the distinguished junior Senator from New York.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the position taken by the distinguished senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the present occupant of the chair, in relation to Senate Joint Resolution 25. It is, of course, with personal pride that I state that in 1923 it was by Senator Charles Curtis, from my own State of Kansas, later Vice President of the United States, and by Representative Daniel Anthony, Member of the House from Kansas, who was a nephew of the late Susan B. Anthony, that the proposed amendment to the Constitution, in practically the same form as now proposed, was first offered.

There have been repeated Senate hearings in Senate Judiciary Committee subcommittees on equal-rights amendments. Such an amendment has been favorably reported to the Senate by large majorities from the full Judiciary Committee at least four times. I think that should be definitely stated for the RECORD. Going back to the record, we find such reports were made in the Seventy-eighth Congress, the Seventy-ninth Congress, the Eightieth Congress, and now in the Eighty-first Congress. There has never been an unfavorable report on the equal-rights amendment, a fact which I think is significant.

The equal-rights amendment is necessary, in my judgment, in order to establish the principle of equal rights for men and women as one of the fundamental principles underlying our system of law. To limit equality is to deny it. The adoption of the equal-rights amendment would strengthen women's position in every field, in business, in the professions, and in industry.

The adoption of the amendment would bring women under the full protection of the Constitution of the United States. It would make them "persons," "people," and "citizens," as those words are used in the Constitution. It would abolish the principle that women are still subject to the common law of England as it existed at the time the Constitution was adopted, unless women, by specific statutes, had been released from that rule. It would establish, instead, the principle of equality of rights of men and women under the laws of the Nation and the States for the future guidance of legislators, judges, and other civil officers.

We are told that today we are engaged in a cold war. No quarter, apparently, is being given in that war. We might as well be frank about it. At present Russian authorities are circulating documents in vast quantities and sending propagandists in great numbers to work for communism among the women of the East, in Indochina, Malaya, Burma, India, and Indonesia. The purpose is to advance communism.

One of the great weapons used in propaganda against the United States in these Near East countries is the failure of the United States to give equality to its women. I think we can most effectively answer this type of propaganda by our action in the affirmative when the vote is taken on the equal-rights amendment proposed by Senate Joint Resolution 25.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] is absent from the Senate today on official business. If he were present he would vote against the pending joint resolution relative to equal rights.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement prepared by my colleague relative to the joint resolution.

There being no objection, Mr. GREEN'S statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF UNITED STATES SENATOR THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, OF RHODE ISLAND, ON SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 25

This is a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women. The title of this resolution is noncommittal, since the resolution certainly relates to this subject—equal rights for men and women.

The purpose of this resolution is in the opinion of most of us, admirable. It seeks to relieve women from unfair discrimination in our laws. But, is this purpose carried out by the provision of the resolution itself? It does not propose any specific means to carry out this purpose. Many changes have been made in our laws, both State and Federal, whereby some unfair discriminations have been done away with. In all these cases, the effort has been to increase the rights of women, not to decrease them. This proposes instead of legislation, a constitutional amendment, and as worded the amendment does not state that discriminations against women are to be removed or their status alleviated or their rights increased. In other words, in my opinion, the proposed article does not carry out the purpose for which it was drafted. It is not enough to state that equality of rights under the laws shall not be denied or abridged. Equality of rights between men and women may be attained either by increasing the rights of women or decreasing the rights of men. The purpose in view is not to decrease the men's rights. However, the purpose of the amendment is assumed to be the former, not the latter, although it may equally apply to the latter.

Suppose, for example, in some State the dower rights of a woman in her deceased husband's estate is less than the curtesy rights of a husband in his deceased wife's estate. It is not enough to say that "these shall be equal." They can be made equal by changing the one or changing the other and the amendment leaves it quite uncertain as to which shall be changed. How can the courts decide when the purpose of the amendment is so inadequately expressed and the means of attaining it so entirely indefinite?

I want to see women's rights increased. They have been increased from time to time in many States, as well as in the United States. I have advocated such measures. I presided at the Rhode Island State Convention when the first resolution ever passed in my State in favor of giving the vote to women was adopted. When I was chairman of the Rhode Island Democratic State Committee I advocated and secured the adoption of a change in the rules whereby women had membership in the State committee in exactly the same manner men alone had had it previously. In both of these cases additional rights were given to women; but if equality alone had been advocated, equality might have been provided by taking these rights away from the men.

Furthermore, nothing is said about duties. Men have certain duties in connection with many of the rights they exercise. Women should have the same duties if they have the same rights, and before we impose such duties we must be sure that women are competent to perform them. I have time and again during the past years drawn attention to this serious fault in the wording of the proposed amendment to the Constitution. Over and over again I have stated that while I favored the purpose of such legislation, I was opposed to this particular wording. It is not only inadequate, but it is so ambiguous as to defeat the very purpose for which it is to be enacted.

I have at political convention after convention favored an amendment dealing with this subject. I served on the platform committee of the Democratic National Convention in 1944 and favored the insertion of a plank relating to this subject. It reads as follows:

"We recommend to Congress the submission of a constitutional amendment on equal rights for women."

At the Democratic National Convention of 1948 I again served on the platform committee and again a plank was adopted which read exactly like the one 4 years before, as follows:

"We recommend to Congress the submission of a constitutional amendment on equal rights for women."

There is nothing in either of these planks approving the language of this amendment to the Constitution stated in this joint resolution.

Again and again I have talked with advocates of this proposed amendment, I have urged upon them the futility of the proposed amendment which I have tried to expose, but have received no evidence of agreement or even conciliation. I have been told over and over again this is the amendment, and this amendment must prevail. This attitude seems to me unreasonable. Worse than that, it seems to me futile to pass an amendment which on the face of it is indefinite and uncertain of accomplishing the worthy purpose we both hold in view. When women and men both find out how little these words mean, how they are nothing more than a slogan to catch the ear, instead of fundamental truths to convince the mind; they will ask for the submission of a constitutional amendment on equal rights for women which will insure new rights being given them and not old rights being taken away. This will be in accord with the planks of our Democratic platforms.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, as one of some 33 cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 25, I rise to speak briefly upon it. When I say briefly, Mr. President, I mean just that, but I would not have the term construed in any manner as a lack of either interest in or enthusiasm for this important measure.

To the contrary, its merit speaks more eloquently than all the debate which we have heard or may hereafter hear on the subject.

I know that there are those who would belabor the question by involving it in legalisms, and, although I do not question either the legal talents or the sincerity of such opposition, I am convinced beyond any shadow of doubt that the clarity with which Senate Joint Resolution 25 bespeaks its purpose, is conclusive as to the legal side of the issue.

What does it say, Mr. President?

Merely that the equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex, then it goes on to give the Congress and several States power within their respective jurisdictions to enforce this provision by appropriate legislation.

Personally, I am satisfied that the adoption of this amendment will not impair any existing rights or privileges of the women of our Nation.

However, as a safeguard and precaution, I shall support the Hayden amendment.

Clearly if this amendment is incorporated in Senate Joint Resolution 25, all existing rights and privileges would be expressly reserved, but with or without it, I shall support the equal-rights amendment, because I am convinced from experience in my own State that the legal aspects of the problem will settle themselves.

Here may I say, Mr. President, that it is with genuine pride today that I stand upon the floor of the Senate of the United States and make the observation that New Jersey has already met this issue squarely and unequivocally, not by mere legislation, but by constitutional mandate.

In the new Constitution of New Jersey, which was ratified November 4, 1947, by an overwhelming vote of the people, we said in article 1, among other things, that all persons are by nature free and independent, that all political power is inherent in the people, and that no person shall be discriminated against in the exercise of any civil rights.

Up to this point, Mr. President, you have heard nothing about equal rights, but article 10 of the Constitution of New Jersey provides specifically that wherever therein the term "person," "persons," "people," or any personal pronoun is used, the same shall be taken to include both sexes.

This action was interpreted by many throughout the Nation as having even greater significance in the progress of women than Wyoming's act in 1869 in granting women the right of franchise.

Actually, Mr. President, I think it can be said without fear of contradiction that for the first time in the history of the United States women have been given equal constitutional rights under New Jersey's new charter.

How did this historic decision come to pass in New Jersey?

Mr. President, women lawyers led the way and the New Jersey Bar Association added its full strength to the cause. Furthermore, the New Jersey Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs entered the fray at the most critical moment, and here it should be noted that the first woman admitted to the bar in New Jersey, Mary Philbrook, of Tenafly, was one of the great leaders in this fight.

It was Mrs. Philbrook who induced me to support the first appropriate legislation on this subject in the Senate of New Jersey. It was Mrs. Philbrook who convinced the New Jersey Bar Association that equal rights for men and women should be embodied in New Jersey's new charter of government.

Among other leaders were attorneys, the Misses Evelyn Seufert, of Bergen County, and Mary Carpenter, of Newark, and Judge Libby Sacher, of Elizabeth.

I only wish these women were here today to speak in my stead because they could do it so much more fervently and with a much superior eloquence.

But New Jersey's fight on this issue is, I am happy to say, a matter of history.

I only hope, Mr. President, that in the proceedings of the Eighty-first Congress we will follow the very admirable example which New Jersey has established by declaring to the people of the Nation that both major parties meant what they said in their respective conventions in Philadelphia, in 1948, when they promised the people of the Nation an equal-rights amendment.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GILLETTE in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. We, in New York, of course, have provision for the observance of equal political rights for women just as the State of New Jersey has. But may I ask whether in New Jersey there have been any laws passed, and whether they are now in existence, giving special protection to women in industry, with regard to hours of work, with regard to minimum wages, with regard to conditions of work, and looking after the comfort of women, their health, and their well-being?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I am proud to say that in New Jersey we have laws covering all the matters to which the distinguished Senator from New York has referred. I might add that I have no fear at all that the amendment in its application will impair or jeopardize or endanger any of the rights established under those laws.

Mr. LEHMAN. Does the Senator believe that the adoption of an amendment such as is now proposed by Senate Joint Resolution 25 could bring about a change in the State of New Jersey or the State of New York with regard to the minimum wages paid to women in industry in intrastate commerce?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I have already answered that in my original remarks, but I shall repeat, that I have no concern about the application of the amendment with respect to the group of laws to which the Senator has referred, and of which we are all so greatly proud.

Mr. LEHMAN. May I ask whether it would be possible for the distinguished Senator from New Jersey to have prepared a list of the statutes in his State concerned with labor and social legislation and with divorce and alimony procedures, which today give greater protection to women than to men? I think it would be a very interesting document for all of us to see, and I believe it would probably show the existence in New Jersey of the same situation we have in New York, to which I have made reference.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I realize that the distinguished Senator from New York has great concern over the possible effect of the amendment on this particular group of State statutes, but I say again on good legal advice—I know the distinguished Senator from New York also has good legal advice—that I myself have confidence that there is not any danger in supporting the amendment. Moreover, I feel that with the addition of the Hayden amendment we will definitely safeguard against all those dangers about which concern has been expressed on the floor of the Senate for the past 2 or 3 days.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, with the distinguished junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] and in company with other Members of the Senate, it has been my privilege to give approval to the pending measure.

The women of America have been waiting for 27 years for the Congress to take the first step to assure to them the rights which as free American citizens should long ere this have been incorporated as explicitly as for one-hundred-and-sixty-odd years they have been contained implicitly in the provisions of our great Constitution.

That the proposals contained in Senate Joint Resolution 25 and in similar previous measures have been introduced in each successive Congress since 1923 without ever an unfavorable report, and yet without favorable final action, must seem an anomalous situation to the women of our country.

If, through this proposed constitutional amendment, the women of America were seeking to gain an advantage to which they were not rightfully entitled, one might find it possible to appreciate the stand, or rather the lack of stand, which has marked congressional consideration of this proposal. But, Mr. President, the amendment seeks no such unreasonable advantage. Stated quite simply, it merely proposes to establish equality of rights for men and women under the Constitution and the laws of the respective States and under Federal statutes. It merely seeks to attain for one-half our population what the other half has always enjoyed; to wipe out the discriminations which they, simply by reason of their sex, have been forced to endure these many years.

It must be noted that all that this proposal contemplates is that the citizens of the United States, through their elected representatives in the various States, should have the opportunity of expressing themselves on this question. It would be for each State to vote the proposal up or down; so our action will not be final by any means if we submit it to the States.

Mr. President, we are prone to be somewhat smug in boasting of our freedoms, as compared to those enjoyed by the citizens of other countries of the world. Yet we have consistently disregarded the fact that the laws and practices of our land have discriminated against women, in three respects:

First, they have worked to the disadvantage of married women, by preventing them from making contracts in their own names, from controlling property or earnings, or from engaging in business in their own names.

Second, they have discriminated against women as workers, as for example, in the so-called protective labor laws for women, which fix minimum wages, maximum hours, and limit type and time of employment.

Third, and finally, they have discriminated against women as citizens, as for example, the laws which bar women from jury service.

The only way to insure prompt action by the States toward the desired equality of rights of women is through an amendment to the Federal Constitution. This method, in addition, is more permanent than State legislation. It would not interfere with States' rights, except to require recognition of the equality of rights of men and women under the law. It would not require uniformity of law on the subject among the various States.

The women of our country have found it difficult to understand, as I have attempted to point out, the many refusals of the Congress to place them on a basis of equality with their husbands and brothers and fathers these many years. Now, with the approval which has been given the equal-rights proposals in the platforms of both major parties, what could we say to the women of the United States to explain any further refusal to carry out the expressed wishes of the two conventions?

Could we go back to the many splendid organizations of women which have endorsed this amendment—and there are numerous ones on record to this effect—and tell them that we, their Representatives in Congress, do not yet consider them qualified for acceptance as full-fledged citizens of this great country?

Can we ignore the remarkable progress which the women of America have made, particularly in recent years, in all fields of endeavor, the professions, the industries, and the arts—yes, and in public office—and tell them that even these accomplishments are insufficient to warrant removal of the discriminatory restrictions under which, and despite which, they have made such outstanding progress?

Certainly, in the field of government there is not only wide opportunity, but great need, for the peculiar talents and abilities which the women of America can bring to bear upon today's problems. In my own State of Maryland, during the 8 years in which I was privileged to occupy the Governor's chair, we found it desirable, and in many cases I might even say necessary, to call upon outstanding women of the State for assistance in matters of government, and particularly in matters affecting the welfare and safety of our people during the emergencies of the war years. I can say without reservation that all those called upon to perform those important duties, together with the other women who during those years served in the State legislature, discharged their tasks satisfactorily and with credit to their sex. In many cases they were able to make contributions which, I believe, were above and beyond any similar contributions which could have been made by men in the same positions and under the same circumstances.

My colleague the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the chief sponsor of the amendment in the Senate, has made the statement that the large group of Senators who have joined him in sponsoring this measure, or who have given promises of support, are anxious to honor the pledges of both party platforms recommending favorable action on this measure of essential justice to women. Let me again assure the Senator that he has my complete support in this matter. As the list of sponsors will show, this amendment is a bipartisan measure, drawing strong support from both sides of the aisle. It is significant that one of its sponsors is the able junior Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH]. It is also significant that the former Senator from Arkansas, Mrs. Hattie W. Caraway, during her service in this body was an advocate and sponsor of the equal-rights amendment.

Mr. President, the equal-rights movement began at Seneca Falls, N. Y., in 1848—over 100 years ago. It was just after the conclusion of the First World War that the women of America won national suffrage for the first time. Their contribution to victory in that conflict was great; but the production miracle of the Second World War, for which the women of our Nation were also partly responsible, has earned them, at the very least, equality of economic opportunity and equal rights under the laws of our land. We can no longer tolerate discrimination against American women, either in the Nation as a whole or in the several States. The equal-rights amendment is the instrument by which this discrimination can be eradicated.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. BRIDGES obtained the floor.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEHMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire, who has been recognized, yield for the purpose of the suggestion of the absence of a quorum?

Mr. BRIDGES. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hill	Maybank
Anderson	Hoey	Millikin
Benton	Holland	Mundt
Brewster	Humphrey	Murray
Bricker	Hunt	Myers
Bridges	Ives	Neely
Butler	Jenner	O'Conor
Byrd	Johnson, Colo.	O'Mahoney
Cain	Johnson, Tex.	Pepper
Chapman	Johnston, S. C.	Russell
Connally	Kefauver	Saltonstall
Cordon	Kem	Schoeppel
Donnell	Kerr	Smith, Maine
Douglas	Kilgore	Smith, N. J.
Downey	Knowland	Sparkman
Dworshak	Langer	Stennis
Eastland	Leahy	Taft
Ecton	Lehman	Taylor
Ferguson	Lodge	Thye
Flanders	Long	Tobey
Frear	Lucas	Tydings
Fulbright	McCarran	Vandenberg
George	McCarthy	Watkins
Gillette	McClellan	Wherry
Graham	McFarland	Wiley
Gurney	McKellar	Williams
Hayden	McMahon	Withers
Hendrickson	Magnuson	Young
Hickenlooper	Malone

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present. The Senator from New Hampshire may proceed.

(At this point Mr. BRIDGES yielded to Mr. LUCAS for the submission of a unanimous-consent request, and debate ensued, which, on request of Mr. BRIDGES, and by unanimous consent, was ordered to be printed at the conclusion of his speech.)

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY IN A DECADE OF DECISION

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I feel compelled to speak today. I am speaking not alone to the Members of the Senate, but also to the American people.

It is January 24, 1950. We have advanced 24 days into a decade of decision. The American people have a right to know where we are going in this decade. They have not been told by the present administration.

I prophesy that during the next 10 years the people of the world will either be enslaved by Red fascism or communism as it is commonly known, or they will contain, resist, and finally destroy this aggressor. There are many responsible persons of both political parties who agree with me. I noticed yesterday that Mr. Will Clayton, former Assistant Secretary of State, who until recently has been a prominent spokesman for the administration, says that by 1955, if we continue our present foreign policy, this continent will be but a little island in a Communist world. But this is not a political issue. No issue which involves the destiny of the United States can be made a partisan political issue.

This is a question which involves America's place in the family of nations. Let me state this issue:

"Shall the United States continue to be the principal nation in the world in which the dignity of each free man is more important than the sovereignty of the state; or shall the United States become a satellite slave state, operated by the criminal conspiracy in the Kremlin?"

I believe America will remain the home of the free. I caution that it will not so remain unless it is likewise the land of the brave.

Our freedoms have been won by heroic souls during three centuries of achievement—through struggle. We have wrought freedom through the sacrifices of countless individuals who have devoted themselves to a cherished cause.

But we can lose our freedoms by assault. We can lose them by default. We can also lose them by muddle-headed appeasement of Joseph Stalin, a man who stands convicted by world opinion as the greatest imperialist aggressor of all times.

Now, there are many facets to this issue. The most timely of these, on January 24, 1950, is the question, "Is the United States to recognize the Kremlin as the sovereign government of the people of China?"

Since July 22, 1937, and from time to time, I have been standing in this Chamber, Mr. President, pleading the cause of the people of China. It was on that date that I submitted a resolution calling for an investigation of scrap iron and steel shipments to Japan, and calling for a cessation of such shipments. Why do I plead for the people of China? It is because I recognize the validity of an ancient truism—"The master of China is the master of the Orient."

For more than a century—since 1843—the United States has stood before the world as a friend of China; not the master of China, for even when this Nation was accused of imperialistic intentions, we stood for the open door in China. We wanted the Chinese themselves to be the masters of China. We have never feared the Chinese people, because they have been our friends.

Joseph Stalin also knows that the master of China is the master of the Orient. His agents in China began a civil war to win control of that nation 27 years ago, long before many Americans had heard of Joseph Stalin. These servants of the Kremlin were opposed at that time by Sun Yat-sen's heir, Chiang Kai-shek.

The story of Chiang, the man of Asia, is too well known to bear repetition. It is sufficient to recall that for nearly three decades he has been steadfast in his struggle against communism. Chiang was once a Communist. He was converted to Christianity. Whittaker Chambers was once a Communist. He returned to the faith of his fathers. Both of these men, in my opinion, have exhibited moral courage of the highest order. Both have been steadfast when the easy way would have been appeasement, compromise, or surrender.

Chiang was steadfast when our Government wavered. When we permitted Japan to buy from us the materials needed to invade his country, he not only fought the Japanese Imperialists, but he also continued to fight the agents of the Kremlin. When we finally admitted the Chinese Nationalists to full partnership in our common effort against the Hitler-Tojo Axis, they pinned down our enemy in the Far East while we devoted ourselves to the struggle in Europe. Chiang saved thousands of American lives when, with Chinese Nationalist troops, he pinned down 1,000,000 Japanese troops in Asia, while we centered our operations in the African-European theater. This was the era when the Chinese Nationalists fought while we promised. We promised them aid and our intentions probably were good. We did not deliver much aid or assistance.

On December 1, 1943, the people of China reached a high point in their struggle. With Roosevelt and Churchill, Chiang signed the Cairo agreement. The signatories agreed that "all the territories that Japan has stolen from the Chinese, such as Manchuria, Formosa, and the Pescadores shall be restored to the Republic of China."

A few weeks later, at Tehran, our ally, Chiang, was stabbed in the back. The Cairo agreement was repudiated at the demand of Stalin. From that day on, if Stalin himself had been our Secretary of State, he could scarcely have done a better job for Stalin, in China, than our State Department has done.

Let us look at our record.

We disregarded China from 1937 to 1940. During this period Hitler was appeased in Europe. Finally the appeasement ended and Hitler launched the so-called phony war. Then we were told that the Rhine was our frontier. We finally had a policy. The outposts of our military security in Europe were established as being on the Rhine.

In 1941 President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull finally harkened to warnings regarding China. It became apparent to them that if we had a frontier on the Rhine we also had a frontier in the Pacific. As the result they wrote the famous Hull notes to Japan in an effort to establish our Pacific frontier. The appeasement of Japan, the Pacific aggressor, ended when these notes were delivered.

Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull believed that China was important to our security. They risked war because of this conviction.

At any time Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Hull and the American Government had wanted to acknowledge the conquests of Japan in China and let Japan have her sweep they could have avoided World War II and the disastrous attack on Pearl Harbor. But Franklin D. Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull thought the control of China by a power hostile to the United States was sufficiently dangerous to our own security to risk a war. If Franklin D. Roosevelt and Cordell Hull were right then, the Truman administration is wrong at this time.

Tens of thousands of our sons and brothers fought a deadly bloody war in the Pacific to protect America from the Japanese aggressor. They won that war. They won with Chiang's help. They won virtually without assistance from Stalin.

I say virtually without assistance from Stalin, for Russia actually was at war with Japan but a few days. For such assistance as Stalin rendered or promised to render against Japan he exacted a high price. We agreed to Stalin's demand that Outer Mongolia be detached from China forever and made into another Soviet Socialist Republic.

We restored to Russia the rights which the imperialist czars had wrested from China in Manchuria. True, Japan, then our enemy, had taken these rights from Russia by war in 1904. But, did we divide the booty evenly between our friend Chiang and our friend Stalin? No, Mr. President, we did not. We gave it all to Stalin.

These were the territories, for which, for 20 years the Chinese Nationalists had been fighting. This was the enemy Chiang and the Chinese Nationalists had recognized first.

Did the Chinese people abandon the United States? When Chiang heard of the sell-out 4 months after Yalta, did he surrender? Did China make a deal? Did the Chinese Republic appease Stalin?

No; the Chinese Nationalists believed we were their friends; that these undercover agreements were wartime expedients. They thought the United States would not appease Stalin. Besides, they were promised assistance.

In addition to the promises, Chiang could see for himself our policy in Europe. After Stalin swallowed Poland, Hungary, Austria, Bulgaria, and Roumania, he saw the United States adopt a realistic policy and he saw the march of communism stopped or contained in Europe. The Chinese Nationalists were accustomed to waiting. They knew China came after Europe. Their turn for assistance would come.

Their turn came, but the assistance did not. China asked for arms and ammunition, and we sent General Marshall and a mission to demand that they take the Communists into their government. The Chinese Nationalists asked for gasoline and our exporters could not get a license to ship it to them. They requested war planes, and parts for those planes, and we sent them medical supplies.

Oh, yes, our people thought they were helping Chiang and the Chinese Nationalists. Did not our State Department officials say we were giving them billions of dollars' worth of aid?

This insidious propaganda created a widespread misapprehension in this country. What are the facts regarding aid to China?

From the records of the Senate Appropriations Committee, I find that from July 1, 1940, until June 30, 1949, a 9-year period which embraces the war and the postwar periods, a grand total of $3,112,000,000 has been furnished by the United States to aid China.

This total of three and one-tenth billions represents the piecemeal assistance which China received as lend-lease, stabilization funds, UNRRA aid, China aid, American Red Cross aid, and Import-Export Bank credits, over a period of 9 years.

That seems like quite a lot of assistance for China. Three and one-tenth billions of dollars is unquestionably a lot of money, even if it was granted piecemeal. But from the same committee records and for the same period of 9 years I also obtained the grand total of assistance we gave Stalin. The total in lend-lease, UNRRA, and American Red Cross assistance amounts to slightly over $11,000,000,000.

Think of that. Chiang, our steadfast friend and ally, has received less than one-third of the amount that Stalin, our one-time ally, has received. Chiang and China have rendered real service to our Nation when it would have been easier for China to appease and surrender. Stalin and Russia rendered service to this Nation on the eastern front in Europe because they had no alternative.

Do not forget that Stalin was Hitler's helper in the dismemberment of Poland in 1939 and 1940. Stalin did not fight Hitler until Hitler attacked Russia. Stalin had to fight to protect his homeland and the gangster regime which is master of the Russian people.

But that is not all the story on our aid to China. The $11,000,000,000 for Russia and the $3,000,000,000 for China are not the whole picture.

How many billions have we actually given China in postwar assistance? The aid we have given since January 1, 1946, is the true measure of our China policy, for it was in the last 4 years that the Communist armies have over-run that nation.

According to the State Department figures we have given less than $1,000,000,000 to China in the past 4 years. When China needed military assistance most, when we did not have to fly it over the hump or truck it over the Burma Road, how much aid did we provide?

The State Department figures add up to $962,000,000. About one-third of this amount, however, is charged to China for services we rendered in disarming and repatriating Japanese troops. That should have been a great help. This service could scarcely have been vital to Chiang in his fight against communism.

Of this amount—the $962,000,000 which the State Department claims we gave China in the postwar period—the Chinese Government offers to produce documentary proof that only $110,000,000 represented arms and ammunition for shooting Communists.

But what the State Department neglected to explain was what these other millions of dollars represented. A major portion was the value of unexpended war assets, most of which were of no value to the Chinese Nationalists. We sold China supplies which had rotted in Burma jungles. We furnished China, often at 100 cents on the dollar, such equipment as trucks, which were defined as vehicles that had less than 20 percent of their parts missing. We charged China the full price for materials delivered in the United States of America. We let Chiang worry about transportation and freight charges. This was the billion of dollars' worth of assistance we rendered to our Chinese friends when they needed it most.

We have still another item to consider in the matter of our postwar aid to China. This is an item which does not show on a statement of funds rendered. It was the gratuitous advice given by the Marshall mission.

This was the United States mission, you, as Senators, will recall, that insisted that the Chinese Nationalists admit Communists to their government. Does it seem possible that our Government could propose that a man who had fought Communists for two decades should take his enemies into his official family?

What would we do if the Socialist government of England, for example, were to tell us that we had to take Socialists into our Government? We would say "No," I hope. But this would not be nearly as preposterous a request as we made of China; for Socialists control the British Government and it would be in their interest to have Socialists in our Government.

Think of this proposal. The same man who so courageously enunciated the Marshall plan for aid to the governments of Europe which resisted communism, the same General Marshall, demanded that Chiang stop his resistance and invite them into his government. How could it possibly be in the interests of the United States to have Communists in the Government of China?

Chiang Kai-shek did the only thing he could do. He turned down this demand. Chiang knew as I know and as everyone should know that it is not possible to cooperate with Communists. Every European country which has tried this form of appeasement has ended as a satellite slave state.

What happened when Chiang refused to concede an inch to the Communists in 1946. For nearly a year, until the summer of 1947, we clapped an arms embargo on the Chinese Nationalists.

This embargo was supposed to stop the civil war since it applied to both the Communists and the Nationalists. Since we were not supplying the Communists with arms during that time, at least to my knowledge, our embargo had the effect of holding Chiang's hands behind his back while the Communists punched him.

So the Chinese Nationalists suffered defeats.

Stalin did not renege on his promises. He furnished rifles and ammunition to his friends, not rusty trucks. We grabbed our man's arms right here in Washington; and when he was beaten and finally forced out of China, we said—here in Washington—that he would not fight; that the reason he lost the war was that he would not fight.

Now Chiang Kai-shek and the remnants of the Nationalists are in Formosa. Stalin has not been able to capture Chiang for trial or force him to suicide as he did Masaryk and Mindszenty. When we appease Stalin we want to be sure we do a good job. We must be sure he has a bloody head to show his slaves. So we write off Formosa.

Regardless of the moral or legal aspects of the situation, Mr. Acheson tells us Formosa is of no value, at least so long as Chiang Kai-shek and the Nationalists are there. Perhaps if Chiang was captured by the Communists, Mr. Acheson would revert to the position his Department held in 1945. It is very interesting that on June 3, 1945, the State Department, which today says Formosa is of no value, in an official bulletin said, "* * * with the exception of Singapore, no location in the Far East occupies such a controlling position * * *." That is a reference to Formosa in a Department bulletin. (Department of State Bulletin dated June 3, 1945, vol. 12, No. 310, p. 1019.)

Much has been said, Mr. President, in this Chamber in recent weeks with regard to Formosa. In answer to his critics, Mr. Acheson, supported by the President of the United States, has written off Formosa and Chiang's government-in-exile.

Formosa, we are told by Mr. Acheson, has no strategic value.

It has been pointed out that Mr. Acheson is not a military expert. He is suave, he has a fine appearance, he has the marks of a diplomat, but he is no military expert. We asked if we could have the views of our Nation's military men. Now we are about to hear from the military experts.

We are about to witness a curious thing. We shall shortly hear from at least two men in the Military Establishment. Both, I believe, will support Mr. Acheson's position that Formosa has no strategic importance. The recent pattern of events in the executive department has indicated that if a top-ranking policy maker is to retain his position, he must unhesitatingly follow the line laid down by the President.

I shall be very interested in what these men have to say. Both know that if they fail to support Mr. Acheson they will be summarily fired by a Commander in Chief who will brook no insubordination or division of opinion. I know the men who will testify are honorable men; but they will by necessity have to choose their language carefully.

The net effect of their testimony will be interpreted as a whitewash for Mr. Acheson's position on Formosa.

But the fundamental question will remain, How long must we tolerate an Asian policy that constantly needs whitewash to obscure its sordid, muddleheaded failure? Our policy is a failure. Repeated attempts to explain our policy prove it to be a failure.

In 1946, at the time of the Marshall mission, the Communists were called liberals and agrarian reformers.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is now speaking about the testimony of the military experts as to the strategic value of Formosa?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. He is already condemning them, in advance, without hearing their testimony, is he not?

Mr. BRIDGES. I said they were honorable men, but knowing the policy of the administration, that if one does not follow the line, his head comes off, they will have to choose their language very carefully. I believe that is a conservative statement.

Mr. CONNALLY. If their testimony regarding Formosa is that from a military standpoint it does have value, that contemplates our sending an army or a navy to Formosa; does it not?

Mr. BRIDGES. No; it does not.

Mr. CONNALLY. If Formosa is not to be used for military purposes, what would be the value of testimony on its importance from a military standpoint?

Mr. BRIDGES. They might testify that it was advisable to send military supplies to Formosa so that the Chinese Nationalists might have one little spot in Asia from which they could combat communism.

Mr. CONNALLY. Supplies are not self-executing. They do not shoot. They do not fight.

Mr. BRIDGES. No; but the supplies which we sent there were not of a type which the troops of Chiang Kai-shek could use in a shooting war.

Mr. CONNALLY. Most of the supplies could not be used for that purpose, because they fell into the hands of the Communists. We found that a great amount of the supplies we sent, such as guns and ammunition, were in the hands of the Communists. I should like to ask the Senator this question: Does he favor sending an army to intervene in Formosa?

Mr. BRIDGES. No. Let me explain.

Mr. CONNALLY. That will take a lot of explaining.

Mr. BRIDGES. Very well. My answer is "No." But I say that the Formosa incident is merely one of a series of events over a period of years. In itself, Formosa is not important, but it is a part of the pattern we have been following. I am not advocating, by any means, sending American soldiers to Formosa at this time, but I would send military supplies to the Chinese Nationalists, who are fighting the Communists, and I would send an American mission to see that the supplies were used properly, and used to fight the Communists.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then the Senator would favor a war of intervention. While he would send no army, he would send a military mission to tell them how to fight and to conduct the war.

Mr. BRIDGES. I would follow the lead of the distinguished Senator from Texas. I would follow his lead as I did when he advocated doing the same thing in fighting the Communists in Greece. I followed his able leadership then, and I would do the same thing in regard to Formosa.

Mr. CONNALLY. We did not send any soldiers to Greece——

Mr. BRIDGES. We sent a military mission.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator did not let me finish. We sent no combat soldiers. How far does the Senator's view on Formosa represent the view of the other side of the Chamber?

Mr. BRIDGES. I do not know. I speak only for myself.

Mr. CONNALLY. One Senator cannot save Formosa.

Mr. BRIDGES. No; and I do not think that the Senator from Texas can, although I believe that with the position he holds as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, if he would speak up as courageously as he did when we sent arms and supplies and a military mission to Greece, it would have tremendous influence.

Mr. CONNALLY. The military mission to Greece and our intervention there were successful, and the war in Greece is over. The Senator now desires to embark on a war in the East without any soldiers and without anything except some ammunition which he would send there, although we sent millions upon millions upon millions of dollars worth of ammunition while the Nationalists were still in possession of the mainland of China, and they could not support themselves, and did not fight, and did not stand up.

Mr. BRIDGES. When it came to containing communism in Europe, the Senator very courageously in his committee and on the floor of the Senate stood up and we heard his clarion voice from the Texas plains cry out for containing communism. When it came to sending supplies into Greece, when there was a bloody war in Greece, he did not hesitate. When the question arose as to sending a military mission to Greece, he did not hesitate. I admired the Senator for his attitude. I felt as he did. Now I ask the distinguished Senator from Texas only to be consistent and to lend his clarion voice and his great leadership to doing the same thing for China he did for Greece.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from New Hampshire undertakes to draw a comparison between what happened in Greece and the Chinese situation.

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. We furnished Greece a few hundred million dollars—I do not now remember the exact amount—and Greece made use of it. She fought. She brought the war to an end. She stopped the Communists from coming down into Greece. That was Greece. The Senator approved that, he said.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. According to the Senator's own figures, we have given China $3,000,000,000. With the $3,000,000,000 given to China, she has not stopped anything. She did not stop the onrush of the Communists. She did not win the war. She did not bring it to an end. She wound up in possession of many of the arms and supplies and munitions which we as a generous Government, a generous people, who have always been attached to the Chinese, sent her. But she made no use of them.

Does the Senator contend that that is parallel to the case of Greece?

Mr. BRIDGES. The $3,000,000,000, made available to China, was not, as the Senator well knows, represented wholly by actual military supplies which could be used for fighting purposes. Only a small part of that amount represented such supplies. A considerable part of the amount represented planes without parts, trucks without wheels or brakes, all kinds of equipment which had rusted and rotted in the jungles of the Pacific, but which we sold to the Chinese at full value. The unfairness of the thing is that while we were selling to certain countries—I cannot give the Senator the exact figures, but I know the general proportions—for instance, to Greece, and some other countries in Europe, ammunition for a certain price, which was only a small fractional part of the cost, at the same time we were selling the same kind of ammunition to China at replacement cost. We charged China at least 15 or 20 times the price we charged other countries for the same articles.

The Senator from Texas has spoken today, and he spoke the other day also, about the dangers in which we might become involved in China. The Senator, however, did not hesitate, when it came to the question of the Berlin air lift, to stand up on the floor of the Senate and be courageous. The Senator has not hesitated to lift his golden voice in this Chamber and in committee in support of our stand in Europe. I agree with the Senator's position in that regard. However, I should like to have the Senator, who holds so powerful a position and who is able to lead and convince others, show the same consistency respecting the East that he has shown respecting the West.

I wonder if the Senator read the statement by Will Clayton, a friend of his—I believe he is a fellow Texan—former Assistant Secretary of State. Yesterday Will Clayton, who has been active in our foreign affairs from the beginning of the war, but who is now out of the Government and can state his mind freely, said that if the present trend continues the continent of North America will be a little island in a Communist world by 1955. That is something we must recognize as being vital at such a time as this. We have to view the picture in a realistic way.

Mao, Stalin's No. 1 puppet in China, exploded the myth which many in our State Department and other liberal left-wingers in our country have been promoting throughout the Nation, that the Communists of China were not real Communists, that they were agrarian reformers, when in April 1949, Mao announced that in the event of war between the United States and Russia, the Chinese Communists would fight on the side of Stalin and Russia. That statement by Mao was somewhat embarrassing to Mr. Acheson and the State Department, who are directing our far-eastern policy. It called for another coat of whitewash. So the August alibi—the State Department's white paper on China—was the result. At that time, together with colleagues from both political parties in this Senate, I branded this document a whitewash for a wishful do-nothing policy.

Mr. Acheson recently wielded another broad brush, but his calcimine mix was thinner than ever. I have read his speech before the National Press Club. That speech is a masterful example of performing a stately quadrille in midair. As nearly as I can understand Mr. Acheson, he seemed to say that those who claim that the real interest of the United States is to stop the spread of communism are putting the cart before the horse. Through the whitewash, it appears, Mr. Acheson thinks that Stalin will not be able to rule China because Mao is likely to become another Tito, and at the insistence of the Chinese people, he will refuse to cooperate with the Kremlin.

If one wishes to be unrealistic, this thought can be very comforting. But a few paragraphs south of this wishful thinking, Mr. Acheson announced that Russia had detached certain northern provinces of China and incorporated them in the Soviet Union.

Mao will not have to cooperate with Stalin in these northern provinces. They no longer are a part of China. They are now a part of Russia.

Apparently, Mr. Acheson is anticipating the need for further whitewash, for he has dispatched a man to the Far East to view the situation at first-hand. When this man returns he will make a report. Any further explanations of our failure in Asia can be incorporated in his report. The man who Mr. Acheson sent to the Far East to make the first-hand survey had one little duty to perform before he left for the Far East. His name is Philip C. Jessup, and before he left he had to go to New York to interrupt the Alger Hiss perjury trial to testify in behalf of Alger Hiss. He told the jury about the former Russian espionage agent's excellent reputation for truth and honesty. He testified as a general character witness. He said he was sorry to interrupt the trial because he had to hurry to Asia where he was going to survey what was going on there.

Mr. President, think of sending to the Far East to determine what is the Communist situation in Asia, Mr. Jessup, a man who has so misjudged another man in his own department by the name of Alger Hiss, a man who has the nerve and the gall to intervene in a case in which the United States Government was prosecuting a man for perjury in connection with charges of espionage for Russia. Think of it. This man Jessup has confidence in such a man as Hiss. How can I have confidence, how can any American have confidence in any report Mr. Jessup makes on China?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it the attitude of the Senator from New Hampshire that because Dr. Jessup appeared as a witness in that case—I care not what he testified to—therefore we ought to intervene in Formosa?

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator is attempting to make a burlesque out of this matter. I wish the Senator would approach such matters as this with the same deadly seriousness he approaches many other questions. The Senator likes to have his little joke and to play his little burlesque, and I am always glad to hear him when he does so. However, I do not take his side remarks too seriously because I know that if he could simply give play to the inspiration in his soul and heart he would stand up and fight for the east as well as he has done for the west. This burlesque is simply a cover-up for the State Department's weakness, and is indulged in because it is obnoxious to him really to get up and defend what has been done, because down in his heart I think he knows that what has been done is wrong.

Think of it, Mr. President. Mr. Jessup has been sent to China to determine the situation that exists there. But first Mr. Jessup testified for Alger Hiss. He whitewashed and gave a good name, and so forth, to this man who has been convicted of perjury in connection with the furnishing of secret information to the Russians. Hiss has been convicted of perjury in connection with the charge of being a former Communist agent. What confidence can we have in a man who testified as Mr. Jessup did? I will admit that Mr. Jessup's word can be taken with as much confidence and reliance as that of some who are conducting affairs for the State Department. But what if Mr. Will Clayton's prediction that by 1955 the North American Continent will be a little island in the midst of a Communist world, is true, Senators, do you know what will then be the feeling of the American people toward the Jessups, the Butterworths, the Achesons? I hope we will be around to take note, if it should happen, because in my judgment there will be strong feeling against those who have helped to bring it about.

How long must we go on attempting to justify Mr. Roosevelt's mistake at Yalta? That was the original error. Let us assume for the sake of debate that Mr. Roosevelt, as his New Deal adherents claim, was the greatest President of all time. Can we not admit that even he could make a mistake, instead of trying to cover up everything?

We can perhaps excuse this fatal mistake. His health was shattered. On February 11, 1945, at Yalta, he was a broken man. He was nearly exhausted after a hard political campaign. He had at his elbow there at Yalta, as a trusted adviser, Alger Hiss, the same Alger Hiss convicted as a liar and perjurer last Saturday.

Let us be honest with the American people. Let us tell them that Mr. Roosevelt made a mistake. Roosevelt thought he could appease Stalin, and he was wrong.

I venture to say that if Franklin D. Roosevelt were alive today, and in good health, he would admit his error and set about to correct it. I do not think he would want the United States of America to compound his error time and time again.

Mr. President, we have confessed to the world that in Europe we made a mistake when we tried to appease Stalin. Let us do likewise respecting Asia.

Surely, the pattern of appeasement is clear to us now. It was clear to me from 1937 to 1941. I was one of those who shared the abuse which was heaped on any man who would have stopped Hitler while there was yet time.

We were called interventionists. It was a vile name. We were accused of beings tools of munitions interests. It was said we wanted to plunge the world into a blood bath. It was claimed we wanted to sacrifice the lives of American boys on foreign soils. Senators know how this pattern of appeasement led to World War II.

The same path will lead to world war III.

We are asked to support a bipartisan—a nonpartisan foreign policy. It would be an ideal situation. But tell me, tell all of us, where can we begin? What nation, what treaty, what territory, what national leader can we support?

Every time the Communist imperialists start a civil war in Asia—to swallow more of the people of the earth, must we wait until the dust settles? Is there any point where we can draw a line and say this island, this country, this meridian is of strategic importance to us?

I believe China was essential to the defense of the United States, but we sold China like Chamberlain sold out at Munich. We had been told, even by the State Department, that Formosa was vital to our interests, but we have used Formosa as Chamberlain used Czechoslovakia.

Now we are told that we will extend economic aid to Indochina, Burma, India, Pakistan, and South Korea. Does this mean these countries are vital to our interests? Or does it mean we intend to fatten them for the Red imperialists?

Apparently Members of the House of Representatives are confused on this question, for last week they voted not to appropriate funds for economic assistance to South Korea.

Are the other nations of Asia vital to the military defense of the United States? Does the security of our Nation have any relation to the foreign policy of the United States?

Mr. President, is Japan essential to the defense of the United States? Is Okinawa essential to our defense? Are the Philippines essential to our defense? Is Alaska of strategic importance to the United States? Is Hawaii important to our defense? What are we to do if they are threatened by "agrarian reformers"?

If none of these is important, then the Pacific is not important. Then we need vote no more funds for these countries, because Stalin will take care of them after they have been stirred by a gentle agrarian reform.

Then I shall ask whether California and Oregon and Washington are important. Then perhaps Mr. Acheson and his Charley McCarthys will tell us that the Rocky Mountains are actually our first line of defense.

Mr. President, I am no warmonger, and I am no jingoist. I am not an imperialist, nor am I an insolent megalomaniac. But Joseph Stalin is all of these things. And the Communist totalitarian system will produce one Stalin after another.

The conviction of Alger Hiss made these questions occur to me:

First. Is all of our foreign policy aimed at concealing the error of a war-weary President or is there a more positive motive?

Second. Does the Communist conspiracy, headed in the Kremlin, still have its agents working in our State Department?

Third. Because of the appeasers—this is a nice name for them—who were, and still are in our Government, have the United States and the other peace-loving peoples of the world lost the peace?

Mr. President, since 1937 I have stood in this Chamber many, many times and have offered suggestions as to our policy in Asia. I believe it is my constitutional duty as a United States Senator to offer my advice and my judgment on such matters.

My suggestions that we stop appeasing aggressors and exert a positive influence toward peaceful settlement of territorial disputes have been ignored. Time and again I have asked that we draw a line against small aggressions before the aggressor becomes a hungry monster.

The failure to stop Hitler and Mussolini in Europe and the failure to stop Tojo in Asia led to World War II. American blood was shed in steaming jungles and on frozen plains, American homes were broken, and American hearts were shattered. We won the war at great cost in blood and treasure. Must we blindly follow the same course to world war III?

Can we contain communism in Europe, and yet allow communism to run rampant in Asia? Is Europe vital to our defense, but Asia of no consequence? Can we win the cold war in the west, while we lose the cold war in the Far East? Is the Atlantic a rampart we watch and the Pacific a redoubt we abandon?

Mr. President, I appreciate the argument that a policy of appeasement is based on the Christian principle of turning the other cheek. I have considered this argument carefully and thoughtfully.

I believe in Christian principles. I think we should apply them. But, I submit, Christianity has no meaning to Joseph Stalin. Communists reject our Christian faith. They despise and defame our Saviour. Can we who believe in Christ appease those who would destroy Him?

I cannot believe that Christ would have us surrender to those who would deny us the freedom to worship Him, our most sacred right.

Mr. President, this freedom—all freedom—has been hard won. Other peaceful peoples of the world expect that we will not tire of the struggle for liberty. These peoples look to us for leadership in this decade of decision.

Let us lead all the world to lasting peace. Let us contain the Red monster while there is yet time. Let us work from the Atlantic alliance to an effective United Nations, firm in the conviction that we cannot appease Communist imperialism and that we will not surrender to the enemies of Christ.

PROPOSED UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT ON EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

During Mr. BRIDGES' speech,

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield that I may submit to the Senate a unanimous-consent request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEHMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, tomorrow at 1 o'clock, the Senate vote on the pending measure and all amendments thereto, the time between 12 and 1 o'clock to be divided equally and to be controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and that no amendments be submitted which are not germane.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I have no desire to object to the reaching of the unanimous-consent agreement—is it not the customary practice to have a quorum call as a preliminary to the propounding of a unanimous-consent request of this kind?

Mr. LUCAS. I may say to my distinguished friend from California, there was a quorum call immediately preceding recognition of the Senator from New Hampshire for the purpose of the delivery of his speech. The Senator from New Hampshire had only been talking about 3 minutes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I wonder whether the Senator will temporarily hold the request in abeyance?

Mr. LUCAS. I shall be glad to do so.

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY AND REGULATION OF TRADE

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, today I intend to introduce a joint resolution which would stop any assistance of any kind whatsoever, on our part, to any nation now having trade agreements with, or engaging in trade or commerce with, or assisting in any manner any Communist nation or Communist-controlled nation or areas.

Mr. President, early next week—on Monday or Tuesday—I intend to address the Senate on the question of what is a sensible domestic policy for our Nation. At that time I shall discuss whether we should have a policy by which the people of the United States would have the equal access to their own markets that foreign countries have been given under the Trade Agreements Act—in other words I will show that the flexible import-fee principle should be substituted for the Trade Agreements Act, and that the enactment of the proposed International Trade Organization legislation should be stopped. I shall address the Senate, early next week, on that subject.

Today I intend to show, first, Mr. President, that we have no definite foreign policy; second, that we are aiding Russia to consolidate her gains in eastern Europe and in Communist China; third, that we are assisting Russia to arm for a third world war; and fourth, that the Secretary of State should make up his mind, relative to our foreign policy, as to whether the Russian Communists are dangerous to us; and, if so, that we should stop all aid to nations which are assisting Russia—the iron-curtain countries—China, or any Communist area; and that we should form our own policy, and not be pushed into it by other nations with whom we are dealing.

Mr. President, at this point, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution to prohibit financial aid to any foreign country engaging in trade with Russia, her satellite countries, or any other area dominated or controlled by Russia. I ask that the joint resolution be read and inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TYDINGS in the chair). Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to prohibit financial aid to any foreign country engaging in trade with Russia, her satellite countries, or any other area dominated or controlled by Russia.

Whereas one of the alleged basic purposes of the Marshall plan is the restoration or maintenance in European countries of principles of individual liberty, free institutions, and genuine independence through a joint program based upon self-help and mutual cooperation; and

Whereas Russia and other Communist-dominated and controlled countries and areas have refused to participate in such joint program; and

Whereas Communist actions have endangered world peace; and

Whereas certain participating nations under the Marshall plan by trading with Russia and other Communist-dominated and controlled countries and areas and through nonaggression pacts and treaties are violating the basic principles of the Marshall plan and are aiding and fostering communism in other areas of the world through furnishing the necessary equipment, machinery, and supplies to consolidate Communist gains in eastern Europe and in Asia; and

Whereas such nations are furnishing Russia and the Communist areas necessary equipment, machinery, and supplies for world war III; and

Whereas it is the sense of the Congress and the basic policy of the Marshall plan and its enabling legislation that assistance to any participating country which fails in any way to meet its obligations to sustain and strengthen the principles of individual liberty, free institutions, and genuine independence, through cooperating with such Communist nations and areas, should be terminated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That on and after the date of the enactment of this joint resolution, no financial aid shall be given by the United States or any agency or officer thereof (whether by loan, grant, lend-lease, or in any other manner) to any foreign country which engages in trade or commerce on or after such date with Russia, her satellite countries, or any other Communist-dominated or controlled area in any other country.

SEC. 2. It is the sense of the Congress that no moneys shall hereafter be appropriated and no loans shall hereafter be made and no equipment or supplies of any kind shall be furnished to any nation engaging in such trade or commerce or permitting its nationals to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, where it is hoped deep, searching, profound, and sincere consideration will be given thereto, and in due course of time report made to the Senate of the United States, for the enlightenment of those who represent the 48 States.

Mr. MALONE. I thank the Chair.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 151) to prohibit financial aid to any foreign country engaging in trade with Russia, her satellite countries, or any other area dominated or controlled by Russia, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I submit and ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point a list of 95 trade treaties, which are at this moment in good standing, that were made by the Marshall-plan nations, now known as the 16 ECA nations, with Russia and with the iron-curtain countries. Of these trade treaties 88 were in full force and effect in March 1949, when the junior Senator from Nevada debated the extension of the Marshall plan or ECA; but since that time those that have expired have been renewed, and 7 new treaties made. I submit the list to be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the list submitted by the Senator from Nevada will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MALONE. The 95 separate treaties made by the ECA nations with the iron-curtain countries and Russia since World War II cover hundreds of products, but they particularly cover the important products, such as steam and Diesel engines, locomotives, electrical equipment, heavy farm machinery, heavy road machinery, tool steel, ball bearings, and practically all kinds of products, made from strategic and critical minerals and materials, such as machine tools, many kinds of machinery and processed and manufactured equipment, clothing, and everything that is necessary for the consolidation of their gains in eastern Europe and in China, and also, which is more important to our national security, to wage war on the United States of America.

I ask that only the tabulated part of the list of equipment and supplies which is to be sent to Rumania from Belgium—to digress, out of the whole 95 treaties, I intend to submit for the RECORD only four or five, merely to show the range of equipment and material covered in those treaties, not the texts of the treaties, which will be available at the State Department, although I may say that many of these 95 treaties, were entirely secret. The junior Senator from Nevada was not allowed to keep some of them in his office, they were so secret. Others were restricted; that is to say, we were allowed only to read them ourselves, we could not make the contents public. I may also say a considerable number of the treaties were in foreign languages, making it impossible to submit them for the RECORD. They were really secret treaties which a representative of the State Department brought to the office of the junior Senator from Nevada, carefully holding them in his hands, they were so vital and secret. For the RECORD, I submit merely the tabulated list of the material that is to be shipped from Belgium to Rumania under the treaty which is now in full force and effect between Belgium and Rumania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the list will be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit 2.)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, from another such treaty, I submit for the RECORD, not the treaty itself, but a list of the material which is to be shipped from Italy to the Soviet zone in Germany. I submit the tabular list for the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit 3.)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I refer now to a further treaty between Austria and Czechoslovakia. Excluding the text of the treaty, I desire to place in the RECORD merely the tabular list of exports from Austria to Czechoslovakia, the purpose in submitting the lists for the RECORD being merely to show the type of material included in the treaties in the nature of trade agreements—material shipped from ECA nations to the iron-curtain countries and to Soviet Russia—as a result of our assistance to these nations. I submit the list and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit 4.)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I submit a further list of materials covered by a treaty between Sweden and Bulgaria, the treaty being in full force and effect, having been made since World War II. I submit for the RECORD only the classified list of the materials to be shipped from Sweden to Bulgaria.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit 5.)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I submit a further list of materials to be shipped from Sweden to Russia, under a trade agreement made between those two countries, now in full force and effect. It is a classified list of materials to be shipped to Russia from Sweden.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the list will be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit 6.)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, from another such trade treaty made between Austria and Poland, now in full force and effect, I submit the classified list, to be printed in the RECORD, showing materials to be shipped from Austria to Poland.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the list will be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit 7.)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask that the classified lists in the trade treaties themselves appear at the end of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibits 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7.)

BIPARTISAN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, the bipartisan foreign policy has resulted in a demand on the part of our high-placed Government officials that the Government and anything its officials may do be above criticism.

That may be all right for Mr. Stalin in Russia, but it is not all right for the United States of America. This Government has already made an unholy mess of every problem and every policy that has been adopted since World War II. They have finally succeeded in wrecking our control and prestige in world affairs.

Where, at the end of World War II, we were the strongest nation in the world, both economically and militarily, we have allowed ourselves to grow progressively weaker in performance, and the Russians, through our indirect help to that nation and to their satellites in eastern Europe and China, to grow progressively stronger. So I say that an administration that has made these terrible mistakes has no right to demand that everything they do should be above criticism. In fact, criticism is the one thing urgently demanded at this time.

They have made a colossal failure, including the Yalta Conference, where Russia was given control of Manchuria, the bread basket and the key to China and Asia, and also given Berlin, which gave them a foothold in Europe. The State Department has stood idly by without any definite foreign policy whatever and, in fact, indirectly assisted Russia to consolidate their gains in eastern Europe and to conquer area after area in China, so that entire great nation is now under Russian control.

China is only a start. Indochina will be next, and then perhaps the Malay States, Siam, and even India.

That is why the Senate of the United States should hold the executive department of the Government accountable for its action. It is on account of such criticism over the past critical periods that we are still a free government and not the government of some totalitarian area like Soviet Russia.

The bipartisan policy has supported the three-part free-trade program of the administration. It has helped Congress to abdicate its position of constitutional control of the economy of our Nation in favor of the State Department through the 1934 Trade Agreements Act as extended, which puts into the hands of an industrially inexperienced State Department the right to say what industries in this country shall survive and what industries shall be scrapped.

FATE OF JOBS AND INVESTMENTS

Through the Trade Agreements Act, the Congress of the United States put in the hands of a Secretary of State the fate of practically every workingman's job and every investment in the United States of America.

The Congress of the United States must take full responsibility for the results when they yield their constitutional responsibility to the executive department of the Government.

MUST MAKE UP OUR MINDS

We must make up our minds whether or not we are engaged in a cold war and whether or not we are against communism.

If we are against communism, then we are engaged in a cold war with Communist Russia and if the Russians are still attempting to conquer the world and bring disaster to us, which the Secretary of State has so often said in his many addresses—then we have no choice but to refuse to assist the Communists under any circumstances, either directly or indirectly with Russia or with her satellite nations in eastern Europe and in Asia—in the hope that they will collapse and fail to consolidate their gains, and will be pushed back by the very people that they are endeavoring to conquer.

It is the only alternative to defeat their purposes, except to engage in a shooting war with them.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT AND FOREIGN POLICY

The Executive Department, including the Department of State, is charged by the Constitution of the United States with fixing our foreign policy. If any arrangement with a foreign nation comes before the United States Senate, in the form of a treaty, the Senate can only accept or reject their conclusions.

It is in the hands of the State Department to make the decision whether or not we are in a cold war, as they have so often stated, and whether or not Russia and her satellite countries, including the Communist areas, are a threat to our existence as a free nation—and if the answer is "No, they are not a threat and we are not engaged in a cold war with them," then we should include all such areas in our regular trade and quit deceiving the American public.

SHOULD CEASE GIVING INDIRECT ASSISTANCE

Mr. President, if the decision of the executive department of our Government is that we are in a cold war with Russia and that our system of Government is threatened through the spread of the Communist doctrine, then we should forthwith cease all assistance of any kind whatsoever to nations which are rendering such assistance through trade agreements, loans, and other arrangements, to Russia, her satellite countries in eastern Europe, China, or any other Communist areas.

ASSISTING RUSSIA FOR WORLD WAR III

Up to this time we have taken no position. We are furnishing substantial assistance to the very nations who have made the 95 trade treaties with Russia and her satellite eastern European countries and are sending them everything they need to consolidate their gains in eastern Europe and in China and to fight world war III.

We are continuing to finance such nations, as for example, England, which country has made several such trade treaties with Russia and the iron-curtain countries. These countries have continually furnished such material to Communist China through Hongkong, including heavy-duty material, consumer goods, and the very products which are necessary for the Communists to consolidate their gains in China. This procedure means that we are willingly indirectly assisting such nations, while we are telling the American people that we shall not trade with them directly, and it means that our foreign policy is being fixed for us, when Britain, India, and other nations recognize Communist China while we have no definite foreign policy at all.

The American people are entitled to know these facts. Our foreign policy is being made for us and, of course, there is a strong assumption by informed persons that the executive branch through the Department of State, has agreed to follow England in recognizing Communist China. The furor raised by persons who want to see a definite policy established before such recognition is made has postponed such recognition. Probably it is only postponed.

MAKE UP OUR MINDS

Mr. President, the Secretary must make up his mind what is important, what we are for, and what we are against as a foreign policy, take a definite position, and deny assistance to any nation which will not cooperate with us, and especially those which go further and cooperate with our potential enemies. We must make our own foreign policy and quit letting other nations push us around. Otherwise, we are slowly being pushed toward world war III, and we shall have very little to say about it when it comes.

FRIENDS OR ENEMIES

It simply means that the ECA nations, including England, which are furnishing the goods to eastern Europe and to Communist China to keep them from floundering and to help them to consolidate their gains are actually in a sense our enemies. They are operating only for profit, while we are taxing our own American citizens to the quick to pay for what eventually will be a hot war undertaken by the Communists against us.

SAME MISTAKE TWICE IN 15 YEARS

Mr. President, we are simply making the same mistake over again. Twice in 15 years we are arming our potential enemies—we assisted Japan in arming for World War II by shipping them petroleum and scrap-iron supplies, and then when they hit Pearl Harbor we sent our boys into the Pacific to catch that scrap iron coming back out of Japanese guns, and it was not pretty. We are now doing the same thing on a larger scale. We are indirectly furnishing Russia and the satellite countries the processed and manufactured supplies which they need for world war III and to consolidate their gains in their acquired areas. It is dangerous to any peace and safety—and ruinous tc our national economy.

ALICE IN WONDERLAND

As a matter of fact, the evidence which is coming out of the State Department, including statements by the Secretary of State himself, in his recent remarks about Russia dividing China, reads like Alice in Wonderland.

The fact of the matter is, according to informed observers, that the Russians are not detaching the northern Chinese provinces and adding them to the Russian orbit, but, under the Communist scheme of things, all of the Communist states, wherever located, whether in eastern Europe or in Asia, will be all united in one league of nations, and by winning the Communist battle in China all of China has become a part of this big totalitarian complex.

The Russians have not only added the northern area of China; they have added the entire area of China to their kingdom.

As a matter of fact, they have aided the Chinese ruler, Mao Tse-tung, in his ambitions and have undoubtedly promised him complete control of the rice and other food-bearing areas to the south, including Indochina, and later the Malay States, Burma, and Siam.

Mr. President, I visited those areas late in 1948. I was there in November and December of that year. What is happening in those areas? We are furnishing the money to support the colonial areas, to support the empire-minded nations in keeping control of those colonial areas in the Far East and the South Seas as well as Africa, whereas Russia is promising them relief from the colonial yoke. So it takes only a couple of trials to guess whom they are for, because they cannot imagine anything worse than being under the yoke of imperialism, called colonialism. The fact that it might be worse under Russian control does not occur to any of them.

I was in Saigon, only a small portion of which is occupied. If anyone tried to live in a house outside of that core of occupied area he was killed. While we were eating dinner one night with the Ambassador, we heard shooting going on about the town. Only a few days before, a sergeant had been killed by a thrown bomb, and previous to that a couple of employees of the State Department had been killed on the road to the airport. It is not a safe country. Even at that time the Communists were really on the way to control of the area simply because we did not sense the situation.

I think many Members of this body will remember that at San Francisco, when the United Nations was formed, I happened to be there under the auspices of the Senate Military Affairs Committee. We remember all the talk about the United Nations—protection of small and defenseless nations, that great forward-looking body which was going to take care of all the small member nations; they would be taken care of under the auspices of the United Nations, and helped in their development. In 4 short years we changed our policy entirely and financed the imperialistic-minded countries in order to enable them to hold their colonial possessions. The people in China, the Malay States, and in Africa are simply slaves. We have forgotten all our high ideals.

NO FOREIGN POLICY

We have absolutely no definite foreign policy and have not had since World War II. We have had a series of financial programs which has resulted in indirectly financing our enemies.

It all simply adds up to the fact that if the final decision is that we cannot deal with the Communists and that they are our enemies, but allow other nations to receive our help while dealing with such nations and forming our foreign policy, it means that we will foot the bill to turn all of Asia Communist and eventually most of Europe Communist. This means that this vast area of China, Russia, and Germany will come into this deal because the Germans have already been told that they can sell all the goods they can produce in China's tremendous markets, while they know from long experience that they will not have such markets in the west. Therefore, we are building up a vast enemy area which in the long run would put us in a very difficult military and economic position.

MUST ESTABLISH A PATTERN THAT MAKES SENSE

Our State Department must establish a definite foreign policy; a pattern which will make sense. It makes no sense at all continuing to finance the British and other European Socialist nations who, in turn, are financing and underwriting the Chinese Communists as well as furnishing the material to consolidate the Russian gains in eastern Europe, while the Chinese Communists in turn are seeking all of southeastern Asia and have already announced their intention of recognizing the Communist guerrillas and making it the official government of Indochina, and which will eventually spread throughout that area of Asia.

It is well known that the Chinese ruler, Mao Tse-tung, and Foreign Minister Chou En-lai have recently spent weeks in Russia, being received cordially and with a great ovation, and Mao Tse issued an official statement in which he ridiculed the idea of severing his domain from the Soviet orbit.

HOW STUPID CAN WE BECOME?

Mr. President, I wish to cite briefly a statement which I made on March 5, 1948, when I quoted from Mr. Bevin and Mr. Wilson, of England. Mr. Wilson was president of the board of trade at that time. At that time I quoted them as saying, "We want to remain neutral." It was made very clear by Mr. Bevin and Mr. Wilson that they wanted to trade with Russia and wanted to remain neutral. They wanted to be the bridgehead—that was the exact word they used—between the Soviets and the United States. I remember their saying that previous to March 1948. I think they are, perhaps, in a fair way of doing just that. Their interests are with Russia, since they are primarily processors and manufacturers of goods, as we are in this Nation, while Russian can furnish mainly the necessary raw materials.

ENGLAND REMAINS NEUTRAL

Mr. President, no one seemed to take that quotation seriously in March 1948, before we had passed the first Marshall Plan Act. I might mention in passing that I visited England prior to that time, late in 1947, as I visited most of the other European nations. At that moment England—taking 1 nation of the 16 proposed Marshall-plan countries—was already 107 percent recovered compared to the 1937 industrial index, meaning that industrial recovery was not the reason behind what we were doing.

It will further be remembered that I proposed at that time that if we wanted to stop communism, if we wanted to rehabilitate industry, and to feed hungry people, we should lend money to private industry in England and the 15 other Marshall-plan countries in exactly the same manner—through the World Bank, I suggested at that time—as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of America loaned to private industry in the United States when private industry was in distress.

I also made suggestions, after visiting Greece and other nations, where groceries were for sale on the streets in large quantities. For 30 cents a can I bought California olives which had been shipped to Greece, and the olive crop of course was Greece's main crop. But we also purchased other canned goods. There was no shortage, if one had the money, about 30 cents a can, or approximately 3,000 drachmas. This indicated that the supplies were not going to hungry people, but were going to people in Greece who had money, and the money was going into the treasury in Greece. It was not used for the purpose of feeding hungry people.

I suggested at that time that we appropriate money to send groceries and whatever was necessary into certain areas and that the effort be properly organized so that we would know that the groceries and clothing were reaching the hungry and needy people, as was not being done at that time.

Then, in order to stop communism, it will be remembered, I suggested that we name the areas and nations whose integrity was important to the ultimate safety of the United States, and that we extend the Monroe Doctrine to include such areas—the 125-year-old Monroe Doctrine which has worked so well in the Western Hemisphere, without signing up with other nations and thereby enable them to drag us into a war whether we decided at the time that our safety was threatened or not.

Mr. President, at the same time, March 1948, I inserted in the RECORD a trade treaty, just as I inserted five or six detailed lists of material to be shipped to the Soviet satellite nations and to the Soviet nation directly by the ECA nations. This one treaty I thought would be enough at that time to cause serious thought. It was a treaty which had been made by the United Kingdom with the U. S. S. R., the Soviet Republic.

The first item in that treaty—and I shall not read them all, because it is available in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the previous date—was 1,100 locomotives. The second item was 2,400 flat trucks, which we call freight cars in this country. The list goes on with electrical equipment, and samples of all the things needed to consolidate gains and win wars.

Apparently not much was thought about the matter, and it was passed over. The Marshall Plan Act was passed.

Then we went into 1949, and what happened? Mr. Nehru, while he was here, said he intended to remain neutral, that he did not intend to take sides between Soviet Russia and capitalistic America. I am not quoting his exact language, but that is what he said. That was the follow-up of what Mr. Bevin and Mr. Wilson had said more than a year and a half previously.

The evidence is cumulative, Mr. President, that not only England but the sterling-bloc countries intend to recognize Communist areas, they intend to trade with the Communist areas, and there is a serious doubt as to the number of ECA nations which will remain neutral if in the future there should be war between the United States of America and Russia. It may be that Switzerland and some of the other nations, like Sweden and Norway, have set a precedent in remaining neutral.

Mr. President, I wish to mention again some of the things I spoke of in March 1949 on the occasion of the debate at that time on the extension of the Marshall plan, to become known as ECA, the Economic Cooperation Administration. The debate took place over the period from March 30 to April 21. It was early in March when I put into the RECORD the nonaggression pacts. I shall not insert them in the RECORD again, but I wish to quote briefly from each one of them, and to say that perhaps since Mr. Nehru has spoken, perhaps since Mr. Nehru preceded England in recognizing Communist China, and England has followed Mr. Nehru and India in recognizing Communist China, and other nations of the sterling bloc and of the ECA nations are following, what has happened, heretofore, is indicative of exactly what is going to happen, regardless of what we do.

As I previously said, it is the opinion of many informed people that last fall, when the conference took place here between England, Canada, and the United States, our State Department agreed with England to follow in the recognition of China, and many people believe now that even with the furor that has been raised, with the suspicion that they may recognize Communist China, that the State Department is still selling a bill of goods to the American people, and will recognize Communist China at the first opportunity when they think the people of the United States will take that bitter dose.

NONAGGRESSION PACTS

I shall quote briefly from a nonaggression pact signed by Anthony Eden, representing Britain, and V. Molotov, representing Communist Russia. This treaty, signed by these two men representing their respective countries of Britain and Russia, which is still in full force and effect, contained two significant articles. Article 6 in the Soviet-Britain Pact provides:

> The high contracting parties agree to render one another all possible economic assistance after the war.

Article 7 reads:

> Each high contracting party undertakes not to conclude any alliance and not to take part in any coalition directed against the other high contracting party.

Mr. President, those provisions read startlingly like the North Atlantic Pact. Since they have pacts now with both the Soviet Empire and the United States of America, it is difficult to see how they could lose in any emergency which might occur later. They have signed up with both Russia and the United States.

In the treaty signed by Mr. Molotov, again, and Mr. Bidault, representing France, which was signed in Moscow, the two articles corresponding with the two just read taken from the British Empire and the Russian Empire treaty, are article 5 and article 6. Article 5 of the French-Russian nonaggression pact reads:

> The high contracting parties undertake not to conclude any alliance and not to take part in any coalition directed against either of the high contracting parties.

Article 6 reads:

> The high contracting parties agree to render each other every possible economic assistance after the war.

Mr. President, both these nonaggression pacts are in full force and effect. All the 95 trade treaties mentioned in the debate today are in full force and effect, meaning that the parties are continuing at all times to send all the material necessary not only to Russia to consolidate her gains in eastern Europe and in Communist China, and to make war quietly and secretly, as they have in the past in China and Indochina and the Malay States and the rest of the Far East, but they are sending them material to make war on the United States of America, if they have that idea in their minds. The State Department and the bipartisan group in this body sold that idea, that Russia was and is our potential enemy, thoroughly to the United States Senate during the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, and all through the second session of the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article entitled "Senator Seeks Ban on United States Aid to Red Traders," written by Walter Trohan and published in the Chicago Tribune. The article is dated January 15, and describes the joint resolution I have just introduced.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR SEEKS BAN ON UNITED STATES AID TO RED TRADERS—MALONE WILL OFFER JOINT RESOLUTION TODAY

(By Walter Trohan)

WASHINGTON, January 15.—A joint congressional resolution to prohibit financial aid to any nation engaged in trade with Soviet Russia, Red satellites, or areas dominated by the Kremlin will be introduced in the Senate tomorrow by Senator MALONE (Republican, Nevada).

MALONE has called upon the State Department to give him a list of all known trade treaties with Soviet Russia and her satellites executed by nations receiving American aid billions.

Last spring, he made public 88 trade treaties by which the Soviet Union is being provided with hundreds of products either directly or indirectly through satellites.

MALONE said he will offer his resolution in the interests of promoting peace. He said communism may be made strong enough to dominate the world if the present flow of vital and strategic materials is continued by countries receiving American foreign aid.

TWO COURSES CITED

"Soviet Russia is being given the materials to consolidate Red gains," Malone said. "If materials are not sent to help Russia, the Kremlin will face uprisings and be pushed back into Russian borders.

"We can call upon Russia to withdraw to her own borders or we can stop sending goods to Russia. If we continue to permit goods to be sent in Russia, the Soviets will be so strong in 2 years that they can tell us where to get off."

MALONE said his resolution also was calculated to halt recognition of communism in Asia by nations receiving funds to fight communism in Europe. Norway and Britain have recognized the Red regime in China. The Communist Chinese have spurned a recognition bid from Tito's Yugoslavia, which is out of grace with Dictator Stalin and is receiving American aid. The British have sent jet engines, locomotives, and other goods to Russia.

TEST OF RESOLUTION

The resolution MALONE will present reads:

"Whereas one of the alleged basic purposes of the Marshall plan is the restoration or maintenance in European countries of principles of individual liberty, free institutions, and genuine independence through a joint recovery program based upon self-help and mutual cooperation; and

"Whereas Russia and other Communist dominated and controlled countries and areas have refused to participate in such joint recovery program; and

"Whereas such Communist action has endangered world peace; and

"Whereas certain participating nations under the Marshall plan by trading with Russia and other Communist dominated and controlled countries and areas are violating the basic principles of the Marshall plan and are aiding and fostering communism in other areas of the world through furnishing the necessary equipment, machinery, and supplies to consolidate Communist gains in eastern Europe and in Asia; and

"Whereas it is the sense of the Congress and the basic policy of the Marshall plan and its enabling legislation that assistance to any participating country which fails in any way to meet its obligation to sustain and strengthen the principles of individual liberty, free institutions, and genuine independence, through cooperating with such Communist nations and areas, should be terminated: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, etc., That on and after the date of the enactment of this joint resolution, no financial aid shall be given by the United States or any agency or officer thereof (whether by loan, grant, lend-lease, or in any other manner) to any foreign country which engages in trade or commerce or permits its nationals to engage in trade or commerce on or after such date, with Russia, her satellite countries, or any other Communist dominated or controlled area in any other country.

"It is the sense of the Congress that no moneys shall hereafter be appropriated and no loans shall hereafter be made to any nation engaging in such trade or commerce or permitting its nationals to do so."

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Truman Policy Will Open United States to Cheap Imports, Says MALONE," written by William Moore, and published in the Washington Times-Herald of January 4, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRUMAN POLICY WILL OPEN UNITED STATES TO CHEAP IMPORTS, SAYS MALONE—SENATOR STARTS DRIVE TO EDUCATE NATION TO NEW THREAT OF ECONOMIC COMPETITION

(By William Moore)

Senator MALONE (Republican, of Nevada) launched a crusade yesterday to awaken the American people to the purpose of the Truman administration's bipartisan foreign policy before it is too late.

That purpose, he said, is to lower the living standard of American workers to that of the rest of the world by permitting foreign nations to divide up the world markets and flood this country with the products of cheap foreign labor.

The plan, he said, is to place the United States on an equality with such countries as Siam in a global political and economic federation with three-score members.

ONLY ONE MORE STEP

Every step but the final and vital one, he said, had already been taken—to win congressional approval of American entrance into the International Trade Organization, a major project of the administration at this session.

The entire plan can still be scrapped, MALONE said, by rejecting ITO.

MALONE said some of his Republican colleagues have been taken in by the bipartisan policy because, like many of the American people, they do not understand its intent.

He called upon those Republicans to join him and the other Republicans in preventing the United States from joining ITO. He called upon the American people to wake up.

IMPORT FEES PROPOSED

MALONE did not begin his campaign without a substitute for ITO. He offered in its place his flexible-import-fee plan, under which he said imports would be encouraged but duties would be kept high enough to protect American workers against the competition of cheap foreign labor.

This principle, he said, would accomplish the same purpose which the sponsors of ITO profess—the raising of living standards everywhere—since it would permit lowering import fees and tariffs for products of those countries which raised wages.

American entrance into a world political government, he said, has been accomplished by our participation in the United Nations.

TRADE PACTS ATTACKED

Two of the three steps necessary to complete the global economic part of this Government, he said, have already been taken:

1. Establishment of the so-called reciprocal trade agreements systems, which he said have produced not reciprocal trade but free trade.

2. Establishment of the economic cooperation administration or Marshall plan, which MALONE said was not understood even by General Marshall, who proposed it. It was actually the Bevin plan, devised by British Foreign Minister Bevin, MALONE said, and foisted upon Marshall.

The United States is still free, MALONE said, as long as it does not join ITO, in which it can be outvoted 48 to 1 at present and by larger votes as more nations join.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Malone Calls for Halt on Aiding Reds," written by Walter Trohan, and published in the Washington Times-Herald of January 16, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MALONE CALLS FOR HALT ON AIDING REDS

(By Walter Trohan)

A joint congressional resolution to prohibit financial aid to any nation engaged in trade with Soviet Russia, Red satellites or areas dominated by the Kremlin will be introduced in the Senate today by Senator MALONE, Republican, of Nevada.

The Nevada Senator has called upon the State Department to give him a list of all known trade treaties with Soviet Russia and her satellites, executed by nations receiving American-aid billions.

Last spring, MALONE made public 88 trade treaties by which the Soviet Union is being furnished hundreds of products either directly or indirectly through her satellites.

MALONE said he will offer his resolution in the interests of promoting peace. If the present flow of vital and strategic materials is continued by the countries receiving American foreign aid, communism may be made strong enough to dominate the world, he said.

"Soviet Russia is being given the materials to consolidate Red gains," MALONE said. "If materials are not sent to help Russia, the Kremlin will face uprisings and be pushed back into Russian borders.

"We can call upon Russia to withdraw to her own borders or we can stop sending goods into Russia. If we continue to permit goods to be sent into Russia, the Soviets will be so strong in 2 years that they can tell us where to get off."

MALONE said his resolution was also calculated to halt recognition of communism in Asia by nations receiving funds to fight communism in Europe.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, Soviet Russia rung down the iron curtain—England and France each have a nonaggression pact with Russia.

The 16 Marshall-plan, ECA nations have 95 important trade treaties with Soviet Russia and such iron-curtain countries, shipping them everything they need to consolidate their gains and to make war.

Both England and India, through their spokesmen, Bevin and Nehru, have said that they intended to remain neutral, they wanted to trade with Russia and the Communist countries.

Now, these same nations, erstwhile allies, and other nations, have recognized Communist China without consulting this Nation, at least without the American people being informed, thus leading us into a foreign policy not only distasteful but which may be definitely dangerous.

Therefore, it is high time that the State Department discharge their constitutional responsibility and make up their mind and inform the American people and the Congress of the United States just what our foreign policy should be before it is too late. It is later than we think.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 25) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I inquire what is now pending before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The measure now pending before the Senate is Senate Joint Resolution 25, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women. The joint resolution is open to amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hill	Maybank
Anderson	Hoey	Millikin
Benton	Holland	Mundt
Brewster	Humphrey	Murray
Bricker	Hunt	Myers
Bridges	Ives	Neely
Butler	Jenner	O'Conor

Gillette	McClellan	Wherry
Graham	McFarland	Wiley
Gurney	McKellar	Williams
Hayden	McMahon	Withers
Hendrickson	Magnuson	Young
Hickenlooper	Malone

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I desire to submit to the Senate a unanimous-consent request with respect to the joint resolution which is now before the Senate: I ask unanimous consent that on the calendar day of Wednesday, January 25, 1950, at the hour of 1:30 o'clock p. m., the Senate proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be proposed to Senate Joint Resolution 25, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women, and upon the final passage of the joint resolution in whatever form it may be amended; provided that no amendment which is not germane to the subject matter shall be received; and provided further that the time between 12 o'clock and 1:30 o'clock p. m. on said day be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents of the joint resolution, and controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I desire to make an announcement to the Senate in respect to the business which will be transacted during the next week or 10 days.

There is now on the calendar House Joint Resolution 184, authorizing the President to proclaim February 6, 1950, as National Children's Dental Health Day. Because of the limitation of time, that measure will be called up tomorrow. No appropriation is involved in the joint resolution. It was unanimously passed by the House of Representatives.

Following that, there will be called up Senate Joint Resolution 2, Calendar 601, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President. It is the joint resolution which abolishes the electoral-college system of electing the President and Vice President of the United States. There will be considerable discussion of that joint resolution, no doubt. It is my understanding that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] probably will offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and probably other amendments will be offered.

Following the disposition of that joint resolution one way or the other, we shall proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 75, Calendar 839, to authorize the construction, operation, and maintenance of a dam and incidental works in the main stream of the Colorado River, at Bridge Canyon, together with certain appurtenant dams and canals, and for other purposes.

That is the order of business which has been agreed upon by the Democratic policy committee in session as of this date.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I regret very much that the Senator from Illinois feels called upon to call up, on 1 day's notice, the joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment providing for a complete change in the entire method of electing presidential and vice presidential electors. That measure was considered last year without action, quite early in the session; but no notice has been given thus far about when it is to be further considered. It is a matter of vital national importance; and it seems to me that the notice given is very short. I personally have to be away the remainder of this week. I hope very much the Senator in some way will be able to postpone consideration of that measure at least until next week and until Senators may have some opportunity to study the matter, which is not one which we ordinarily get into until and unless we have to. I did not know the Senator was even considering bringing up that measure soon, until I heard of it earlier today.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in reply to the able Senator from Ohio, I should like to observe that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is one of the sponsors of the joint resolution, has written to me on two different occasions this year, requesting that I call up Senate Joint Resolution 2 for consideration as soon as possible. The Senator from Massachusetts and other Members of the Senate who are interested in the measure have appeared before the Democratic policy committee, as I recall, upon two different occasions, urgently requesting that the Senate give early consideration to the joint resolution during the second half of the Eighty-first Congress. Only last week, in a short colloquy which I had with the Senator from Massachusetts, I advised him that we would consider at the policy committee meeting the advisability of taking up the Senate joint resolution, with a view to having it disposed of one way or the other. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that perhaps the notice is short, and I regret that the Senator from Ohio will be compelled to be out of the city. But it seemed to the Democratic policy committee that these two measures were about the only ones which were ready for consideration at this time; and we felt obliged to advise the Senate that this was the plan proposed by the policy committee.

Mr. WHERRY rose.

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. I noticed that the distinguished majority leader stated in a press conference that there is a possibility of bringing up one of the resolutions to create a permanent Small Business Committee. I do not wish in any way by interrogating the majority leader to get a commitment in that respect; but let me inquire whether he feels that there is a possibility that one of those resolutions might be taken up soon for debate. If that could be done, the resolution might supplant Senate Joint Resolution 2, until the consideration of the Small Business Committee resolution could be concluded, if it is in the mind of the majority leader to have the Senate do so.

Mr. LUCAS. I am glad the Senator from Nebraska has raised the question as to Senate Resolution 58, which was submitted by him and the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], to create a standing Committee on Small Business. I should like to advise the Senate that a conference is being held by the Democratic Members on Thursday of this week, primarily for the purpose of discussing that very resolution, which has been reported favorably by the Senator's committee. It seemed to me to be impossible, probably, for the Senate to take it up before next Monday, because I am sure there will be considerable discussion behind closed doors in regard to the resolution, and probably more discussion of it, I say to my friend the Senator from Nebraska, when the resolution finally is brought up on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well.

Mr. LUCAS. But we shall take it up at some time in the near future.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KEFAUVER rose.

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I wish to ask the distinguished majority leader whether he has in mind having the Senate take up at any time soon Calendar 481, House bill 4080, to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War. That measure passed the House of Representatives after a great deal of consideration; and the Senate Armed Services Committee has had extended hearings on the question. I know the Secretary of Defense is anxious that the bill be expedited as much as possible.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that he take up that matter with the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], chairman of the committee, is a member of the Democratic Policy Committee; but unfortunately he was absent from its meeting today, and this question was not discussed. We shall be glad, however, to take it up a week from today.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Let me supplement what the Senator from Illinois has just stated. I can assure the distinguished majority leader that the Senator from Maryland is most anxious to have this measure taken up by the Senate. The Senator from Tennessee is in charge of it, and did much work on it. From what has been said to me, I know it is the hope of the Armed Services Committee that House bill 4080 may be considered and some decision arrived at regarding it as soon as possible. The measure is a highly technical one.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator.

PROSPECTIVE CALL OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Illinois when he contemplates a call of the calendar?

Mr. LUCAS. I may say in answer to the inquiry, that, as I understand, only a relatively small number of new bills have been reported by the committees. In view of that fact I feel that it is not proper as yet to call the calendar. Most of the bills on the calendar at the present time will be objected to, as they have been objected to in the past, on previous calls of the calendar.

Mr. TAFT. There are some bills on the calendar to which I think there will be no objection. They were objected to in the latter part of the last session, in October, for various reasons—the absence of Senators and so forth—but I think there are several bills on the calendar which might very easily pass.

Mr. LUCAS. I am very happy to have that reassurance from the Senator from Ohio. One of the ways by which we can expedite matters in the Senate is to have Senators present on days when the calendar is called. Then perhaps after a brief explanation, bills may be passed without making them special orders of business.

SUGGESTED PAIRING ARRANGEMENT FOR ABSENT SENATORS

Mr. President, there is one other matter I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate while I am on my feet. During the past 2 or 3 years, it has been customary to hold Lincoln Day and Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners, extending over a period of 2 or 3 weeks, or perhaps longer than that. First, the Republicans go forth for a week or 10 days to sell their goods and wares to the public; then we follow with the Jefferson-Jackson Day speeches. We do a little better job perhaps than the Republicans. But what I should like to suggest to my able friend from Nebraska and other Members on his side of the aisle is, that instead of merely more or less marking time and doing nothing perhaps for 3 weeks, we go ahead with the business of the Senate, and arrange that when Senators on the other side of the aisle leave to make speeches anywhere in the country, we on this side of the aisle will give them live pairs, and thus assure them that they will be recorded in line with their thoughts. In that event, when Senators on this side of the aisle are called upon to perform a similar duty, under the Jefferson-Jackson creed of democracy, we will expect Senators on the other side to reciprocate. I should like to ask my distinguished friend whether he believes such an arrangement might be effected between both sides of the aisle.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, as usual, the minority wishes to cooperate with the majority leader. I should like to ask, does the majority leader expect to have any period of vacation at all, say either from Friday until Monday, or from Thursday until Monday? As I understand, the Lincoln Day dinners will probably come on the 10th and 11th of February, Friday and Saturday. I am wondering whether the majority leader contemplates a recess possibly from Thursday until Tuesday, or from Friday until Tuesday, or is there to be any recess? I merely ask the majority leader to take the suggestion under advisement, because I feel that if the dinners or celebrations are held at the week end, the matter may be arranged without any difficulty.

About the Democrats doing a better job than the Republicans do in their speech making, I may say the speakers from the other side of the aisle may get more money than we on this side get. If that is what the Senator means, I think perhaps it is true. [Laughter.] But it takes a longer time for us to do the work than it does the speakers on the Democratic side. So if we could have another day, preferably a weekday, we should deeply appreciate it.

Mr. LUCAS. I may say to my friend, he will need more than 3 or 4 days for the Lincoln Day dinners.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. The distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], about a week ago, stated on the floor of the Senate he had about nine Lincoln Day speeches to make in the Dakotas. I agreed that I would try to get him a live pair while he was absent making Lincoln Day speeches, because I want Senators on the other side of the aisle to do everything they can in memory of the patron saint of their great party.

Mr. WHERRY. We appreciate that, and the Senator may rest assured we are going to do everything we can. I should merely like to ask the majority leader to please take under advisement the suggestion of a short vacation, and to make an announcement about it as early as possible. I feel that inasmuch as the days for the dinners, speeches, and so forth, are the 10th and 11th of February, possibly a recess could be taken from Thursday until Monday, or perhaps from Friday until Tuesday. If so, it would be deeply appreciated. It would evidence the splendid cooperation which the minority leader feels we should have in making Lincoln Day speeches throughout the country.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I am glad to hear the majority leader say he would like to continue the work of the session during this week because I think we are all anxious to expedite the work so we can at least get home in time for haying. But I realize that a good many speakers who are planning to be away for a week or so might be a little apprehensive lest a vote should come up during their absence. So I should like to suggest that the majority leader bring up the FEPC bill just before the beginning of that week so that any Members who happen to be away for a week or two will be reasonably sure that no important yea-and-nay vote will be taken during their absence.

Mr. LUCAS. I appreciate the very constructive suggestion made by my friend from Vermont. I shall take it under advisement.

Mr. President, there is one other suggestion I should like to make. The Lincoln Day dinners usually come about the same time, although I know that there have been different dates even for Lincoln Day dinners held by the Republicans throughout the country.

Mr. WHERRY. That is true.

Mr. LUCAS. If we enter into the amicable understanding whereby pairs are to be arranged, since, although the principal Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners usually take place during one week, sometimes another one is held a couple of weeks later, and some Senator might be away at that time, I should like to have it understood that pairs will be arranged under those circumstances.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, if the distinguished majority leader will take that matter up with me, I assure him we will do our level best to work out an arrangement which will be satisfactory to both sides.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the able Senator from Nebraska. I believe we could expedite business a little more if we were a little more generous with our pairs. Sometimes when a number of Senators are away pairs cannot be obtained. I believe if we were a little more generous in regard to the pairing procedure we could get along better and transact a little more business. I shall be glad to talk to the minority leader along that line and with other members of the Republican Party. I know I personally feel that any Senator who is at home on necessary business while an important measure is being considered by the Senate should have a live pair. That is the way I personally feel about it, and I think perhaps we might make better progress if we were more generous along that line, because at various times the pair question has been rather troublesome.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I assure the majority leader once again we shall endeavor to work out some arrangement that will be satisfactory. I should like the majority leader to know that I personally have some very strong opinions about pairs, and I was glad to hear him say that Senators who are absent on official business or those who have to be at home should be protected. I think there are times possibly when a live pair is all right. On the other hand, I do not want the pair system abused, and I know the majority leader does not. In all the years I have been here I have never indulged in it myself, except once or twice when I went across the country, and I think one other time. So I have those feelings about it. I want to assure the majority leader that so far as the minority are concerned we shall do our level best on the occasions to which he has referred to see what can be done to cooperate to the fullest with the request he has made.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 25) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, in the interest of accuracy, I rise to clarify two statements which I made on the floor of the Senate on yesterday during the debate on the effort of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] to substitute the so-called equal-status bill for the so-called equal-rights amendment.

In the course of the discussion, I stated that the women who favor the equal-rights amendment, and therefore the passage of Senate Concurrent Resolution 25, are not working people. Of course, that statement is in error. One of the major proponents of this resolution is the Business and Professional Women's Club. A requirement for membership in that splendid organization is that the applicant for membership be engaged actively in some business or profession.

In the course of the discussion, also, in a colloquy with the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], I may have left the impression that women could not escape, as a legal matter, a particular type of service while serving in the armed services if the equal-rights amendment should be ratified.

It has been called to my attention that, as a matter of fact, the type of military service for men is probably not established as a legal right, but as an administrative matter, at the present time. I assume the same situation would be true regarding women.

I do not ask that the RECORD be corrected, but I did want to clarify these points before our proposed substitute is considered further by this distinguished body.

In conclusion, I want to apologize to the Business and Professional Women's Club for my error in having said they are not working people. Of course, they are.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the apology will be recorded.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, for the information of Senators on the important questions raised by Senate Joint Resolution 25, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a compilation which has been prepared for me by the National Consumers League showing State laws that would be jeopardized by the measure under consideration.

There being no objection, the compilation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE LAWS JEOPARDIZED BY THE PROPOSED EQUAL-RIGHTS AMENDMENT

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 24, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Edward Gardiner Latch, D. D., Metropolitan Memorial, the National Methodist Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O God, our Father, eternal source of wisdom, power, and love, in the quiet of this moment help us to be still and to know that Thou art God. Lead us, we pray Thee, through all the changes of this earthly life to rest our spirits upon Thee and upon those eternal foundations of truth and love which Thou hast laid for us in Jesus Christ.

With the assurance of Thy presence we take up the duties and the responsibilities of this day. May we not listen to the lower voices which call us to compromise, which tell us of the easy way, and which say that to be selfish is to be wise; but may we listen to the higher voices which call us to be courageous, which tell us of the right way, and which say that only in truth is there wisdom and strength and peace. So we pray for courage to take the right way in truth that wisdom and strength and peace may be ours.

In Jesus' name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE FUR INDUSTRY

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

THE ISSUES

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, the fur industry in the United States is well on the road to extermination unless we come to the rescue. I have devoted much of my time to a careful study of the problem and I have come to the conclusion that the predicament in which the fur industry, which is so vital to my own district in Louisiana, finds itself, stems from two causes; namely, the burdensome wartime excise taxes on furs and the fact that the United States has become the dumping ground for foreign furs, especially Russian furs. To cure the disease we must remove the causes. Accordingly, I advocate two measures which, in my judgment, would save our fur industry from destruction.

First, we should repeal all wartime excise taxes, especially the tax on furs.

Second, we should adopt legislation to control the importation of furs and fur articles in order to prevent injury to our domestic fur-producing industry.

Mr. Speaker, I am keenly aware of the necessity for such legislation because I represent one of the greatest fur-producing districts in the entire United States, but I realize that no one Member of this body can bring it about alone. I, therefore, invite all Members of this House, and especially my colleagues from fur-producing areas, to join me in the movement. Within the limits of my humble ability I want to take this occasion to give you the benefit of my research with the hope that I can help to develop concerted thinking along that line. It is a very interesting and challenging story.

IMPORT INCREASES

An examination and analysis of the figures compiled by the Tariff Commission covering the prewar and postwar periods is enlightening and startling. For instance, the value of furs imported into the United States in 1938, the year before the war in Europe, was $42,000,000; while in 1946, the year after the war, the value was $241,500,000.

Mr. Speaker, Louisiana is the largest fur-producing State in the Union, and the Third Congressional District, which I have the honor to represent, produces more muskrat fur than any other section of the entire United States. Let me illustrate what the official figures of the Tariff Commission show with regard to muskrat furs. They reveal that imports of muskrat pelts have increased about 500 percent since the war. For example, in 1938, the year before the war, 514,000 muskrat pelts were imported into the United States; while in 1946, the year after the war, the total was 3,164,000.

SOURCE OF IMPORTS—RUSSIA

Mr. Speaker, hostilities are over but the cold war still goes on. It is no wonder that we find Russia at the root of the evil.

The American dollar commands respect in all the trading centers and money marts of the world. All foreign countries are hungry for our dollars because with them they can trade and buy goods anywhere, any place, any time. It is not surprising, therefore, that Russia is bent on getting her hands on our American dollars in order to finance her program in the hard-pressed currency areas. Why not then dump her furs at practically any price in order to secure American dollars? Russia is in a peculiar position to do so. The Soviet Union is doing just that, and I will tell you how.

In his testimony before the Special Subcommittee on Fur of the House Committee on Agriculture, Mr. E. C. Ropes, Chief of the Russian Unit of our Department of Commerce, on April 17, 1949, said:

Mr. ROPES. In connection with my work there for some twenty-odd years, I have had occasion to study the fur industry, not only since the revolution, but also before. The part that is of interest to people here as of the present time is the organization of the fur industry in Russia and the method by which they dispose of the catch abroad, particularly in the United States which is the largest customer for Russian furs.

Congressman GRANGER. The Government does the purchasing?

Mr. ROPES. Yes, sir, the Government does it. The agency set up for that purpose, which handles both the purchasing, collection, and export, is called the Soyuspushnina, which means the All Union Corporation for Furs—the fur industry, the fur sales, the fur exports, the aggregate in their purview and field of activities, all these operations.

So much for the acquisition of the furs in Russia by the Russian Government. Now, how does the Russian Government sell the furs in the United States? Why, through the same or similar agencies, of course. I have before me the December 21, 1949, issue of the Women's Wear Daily, a fur-trading paper. The headline is entitled "Silberman Signs Russian Contract for Wild Furs," and the article goes on to say, "This was made known at the week end by J. D. Silberman, vice president in charge of the New York branch. He said a quantity of Russian wild furs has been purchased after negotiations with representatives of Soyushpushnina, Soviet Fur Trust here in New York."

I also hold in my hand the June 1, 1949, issue of the Women's Wear Daily. The headline reads, "Amtorg closes large deals here for Russian squirrel." The article reads in part as follows:

A substantial quantity of squirrel skins, totaling about three-quarters of a million, has been purchased from the Russian Government at prices unofficially estimated to be at a new low for the year. * * * The transaction was made by Amtorg Trading Corp.

The Amtorg Corp. is owned and operated by the Russian Government, and is known to be carrying on espionage activities in the United States. As a matter of fact, last fall six top officials of this outfit were arrested by the FBI.

It is clear, therefore, that the Russian Government acquires the furs from the Russian people and sells them to the United States on a state-trading basis, with obviously no high standard of living wages paid to the trappers and laborers abroad; certainly no fancy salaries paid to white-collar employees; evidently no commissions at all paid to middlemen. It must always be kept in mind that selling policies of Russian agencies are not governed by costs based upon private ownership such as prevail in a free economy. They do not have to worry about these details, because big brothers Soyushpushnina and Amtorg take care of everything. How can we possibly compete under these circumstances?

So that is how the Russian Government does business with us in furs, and what a business.

I have demonstrated that foreign-fur imports into the United States have increased by leaps and bounds since the war. A further analysis of the official figures of the Tariff Commission proves that the Russian fur dumping practices primarily account for the increase. For example, in 1930 the total fur imports from all countries to the United States were $57,000,000. Of this amount Russia supplied us with $3,000,000, or 5.2 percent. In 1948 the total imports into the United States amounted to $161,000,000, and the Russian imports accounted for $38,000,000, or 23.6 percent. As a matter of fact, since the war, an average of 30 percent of all imported furs came from Soviet Russia and satellite countries under her control, whose fur industry is operated entirely on a state-trade basis.

But that is not all, Mr. Speaker, the record proves beyond question of doubt that Russia has found out that her cheap furs are the commodity best suited for export into the United States to secure American dollars at any price, in order to carry out her program. Furs account for 59 percent of the total Russian exports into the United States since the war. This is shown by the following table compiled by the Tariff Commission:

Value of Russian exports to United States

[In thousands of dollars]

Year	Furs	All other goods	Total of all exports to United States	Percentage of furs to total
1946	69,735	30,837	100,572	69
1947	43,308	33,794	77,102	56
1948	40,522	38,252	78,774	52
Total	153,565	102,853	256,448	59

Again referring to muskrats, in which I am profoundly interested, I observe that during the year 1948 Russian exports into the United States amounted to over 60 percent of our total muskrat imports from all foreign countries. And from figures received from the Tariff Commission during the last 9 months of 1949, it is clearly evident that even a larger volume of muskrat fur was imported last year.

I say to you that Russia dominates our American raw-fur market and is crushing and strangulating our fur-producing industry. It is high time that we do something about this critical situation.

OTHER FOREIGN BARRIERS

It is true that the United States always absorbed some of the furs of friendly foreign countries, but in limited quantities. The Russian dumping practice since the war, which I have already described, is not only stifling our domestic fur-producing industry but is also operating to the great harm of our friendly countries. In order to meet the Russian competition, I should like to point out some of the discriminating and abusive trade practices that friendly nations have had to resort to in order to sell their furs on our market as they did before the war.

Our close and friendly neighbor to the north, Canada, has had to place in operation an export subsidies program. This is shown by the following article which appeared in the Women's Wear Daily of February 19, 1947, from which I quote in part:

Canada too guarantees silver-fox prices.

The Dominion Government is undertaking to guarantee a minimum price for silver-fox pelts, ranging up to $62.50 for the top grade, provided they are delivered by ranchers before May 1 of this year, it is learned today.

Appearing in the same trade paper of January 28, 1949, is an explanation in part of the export compensating rebates program that Denmark is operating under:

Mink levels steady at Danish auctions: United States buyers active.

A good part of the mink will go to the United States via London, Max Weiss, London representative of Scandinavian Fur Auctions, points out and that all quoted prices are subject to a compensation rebate of 25 to 30 percent for goods earmarked for export.

For example—

You purchase in Denmark a mink pelt for $10 and export it to the United States. The Danish Government will rebate $3 to enable you to sell the mink pelt on the United States market for $7.

Most, if not all, other friendly nations engage in similar subsidy and rebate practices. It is no wonder that the domestic raw-fur market is demoralized and that the domestic fur producer is being destroyed.

Our friends in Canada are also very much alarmed about the Russian dumping practices. As proof of that statement, I quote from an article appearing in the Fur Reporter, a Canadian publication, of October 19, 1949:

Great quantities of these Russian furs are sold with utter disregard as to price, and, naturally, such transactions have had a depressing effect upon the market for our domestic furs, as well as being largely responsible for precipitating the downward trend in price levels experienced by the industry to an increasing degree during the past three seasons.

It would seem to be the opinion of the author of the above article appearing in the Fur Reporter, Mr. Arthur Prentice, general manager, Canadian Fur Auction Sales Co., Ltd., of Quebec, Montreal, that, far from offending them, friendly nations would welcome legislation along the lines I advocate because in that article Mr. Prentice states:

In view of the uncooperative attitude of Russia toward every effort to establish peace and prosperity in the world, a situation has developed which is costing the taxpayers of Canada and the United States billions of dollars in defense and foreign aid and therefore it would seem that the North American market should at least be restricted on a tariff basis, as far as the importation of Russian commodities are concerned. Such a step would reestablish the demand for many American furs and relieve the burden of heavy imports to this continent.

ONE-WAY TRAFFIC

Mr. Speaker, the dumping practices of Russia and the subsidy-rebate programs of friendly nations do not tell the whole story. Our domestic fur industry is being squeezed in other ways, both abroad and at home.

Our doors are wide open for foreign furs to come into the United States from Russia and all other countries. All raw furs of every type and description, with the single exception of fox furs, have always entered this country duty-free. We have no restrictions whatever to prevent or in any way control foreign furs entering the United States. Our international fur policy constitutes a one-way traffic because foreign countries, for the most part, do have practical restrictions against our shipping furs abroad. For example, as a practical proposition, we can only ship one type of furs to France if we import an equal quantity of a different type. Thus, if we ship muskrats to France, we must be prepared to import into the United States an equal quantity of some type of French furs, and before we can ship furs to Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, we must obtain import licenses, and to obtain such import licenses is well-nigh impossible. The net result, on the whole, is that the fur channel coming into the United States is wide open, while our fur channel going abroad is fraught with such barriers, import licenses, and other obstacles that we cannot effectively use it.

The point I am making about foreign barriers and restrictions is discussed in an article appearing in the July 6, 1949, issue of the Fur Reporter. The article is entitled "One-Way Trade Dangerous to United States," and reads as follows:

The entire situation is discouraging and very dangerous because the United States cannot continue to consume furs from all over the world, spend American dollars for their purchase, and not be able to sell any furs or fur merchandise to these countries because of Government restrictions. It is a very disturbing situation and it is no wonder that there are protests arising in the United States by the fur farmers and the raw-fur collectors and trappers against the influx of fur skins from everywhere, but barriers against American furs in so many different markets.

To add to our fur troubles abroad, our domestic industry is being penalized at home. Thus, in peacetime, our domestic fur industry is still saddled with wartime excise taxes.

LEGISLATION NEEDED

Mr. Speaker, I have already introduced a bill to repeal wartime excise taxes. I understand that there is pending in the Senate a bill to which there was added a rider to control the importation of furs and fur articles. I am watching the outcome of the latter bill and if it does not pass, I intend to introduce legislation in the House along the same lines. I respectfully solicit the support of all Members of this body of such legislation.

RUNAWAY "PAPPY" BILL

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, there are approximately 1,000,000 deserted wives and children in the United States. Their fathers and husbands in many cases have crossed State lines. Many of these deserted wives and children are public charges because of such desertion. It has been proven that States are utterly unable to cope with this problem; accordingly, last session I introduced a measure to empower the Federal courts in the district in which a fugitive father might be found to order him to pay support for the children he deserted.

I hold in my hand, a record sent me by Judge Donald E. Long of Oregon, of a case where a father deserted his wife and six children, went to California, and was gone for 7 years. During those 7 years he contributed exactly $10 to their support. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no more important legislation pending before this Congress than the bill introduced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] and me, to bring what we call the runaway "pappies" to their senses, and cause them to meet their moral obligations as fathers; an obligation which even the lower animals do not shirk. I commend it to your consideration. I hope that all of you will become interested in the matter.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I know of a case where a mother ran away from her children. Does not the gentleman agree that the legislation should be broadened to cover such cases likewise?

Mr. JACOBS. The bill would include the mother; it includes any parent who deserts his or her child, and empowers the Federal court in the district where the deserting parent may be found to order the parent to contribute to the support of the children he has deserted. Because the father is the most frequent offender I coined the phrase "Runaway 'pappy' bill."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KARST asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

Mr. TRIMBLE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

Mr. ENGLE of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. THOMPSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. DOLLINGER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

HENRY J. BACKOF

Mr. BOLTON of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLTON of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, it was with the deepest regret that I learned of the sudden death of Mr. Henry J. Backof, who died while on his way to work yesterday morning. Mr. Backof was a resident of my district; and an employee of the House of Representatives. He was a devoted husband, the father of four fine children; and a real family man.

Most of us knew Henry Backof as a genial man, who was always willing to do a favor for anyone. He worked in the House library for more than 10 years; and in spite of a change in the majority leadership in the House, Mr. Backof was continued on in the library because of his intimate acquaintance with his duties and his pleasing and accommodating disposition. He will be greatly missed by all of us who knew him, and particularly by his associates in the library. My deepest sympathy goes out to his wife and family in their hour of sorrow. May his soul rest in peace.

ALGER HISS AND HIS FRIENDS

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, some of the people who helped place Alger Hiss in high place in our Government, where he could betray us, are still holding positions of power and influence. They are still in positions where they can strike powerful blows to weaken our Government.

One of the chief sponsors of Hiss was Felix Frankfurter, now occupying, as Justice of the Supreme Court, one of the positions of greatest power in our entire Government. He has gone to great lengths to aid Hiss to escape his just punishment for betraying his country. So has another powerful figure in the Government, Secretary of State Acheson. If there are any two people in Hiss' circle of friends and acquaintances who ought to know his character, these two are in position to have intimate knowledge regarding him.

Hiss has finally been convicted in spite of their efforts, of aiding the Communist spy ring, which has been exposed both here and in Canada.

In my opinion, the conviction of Hiss for his betrayal of America to the Communists is but a scratch on the surface. It is only a small part of the clean-up which is going to have to be made if we expect to save our country and our Government, and defeat the announced intention of the Communist Party to destroy our free government and set up in its place a Communist dictatorship.

It is a shocking thing that one who occupied positions of power and trust as Hiss did, should betray his Government and people. It is also a shocking thing that other high-placed and powerful officials of our Government rushed to his aid and assistance and threw their weight and the influence of their high offices to his side of the fight. Hiss is but a symptom, and the real causes should be eradicated. When that is done, the symptoms will disappear along with them.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TACKETT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES of Missouri asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter.

Mr. LUCAS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement by the Independent Petroleum Association of America on the subject the Present Oil Situation.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO FEPC ACT

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, when and if the FEPC measure comes before this House I shall offer an amendment which I shall read to you so that the Members may understand just exactly what they will have before them at that time. I shall suggest that the House accept the following amendment:

This act shall take effect in each State on the date on which the State by law (1) declares that the rights of some persons within the jurisdiction of the State to employment without discrimination because of race, color, religion, ancestry, or national origin are being denied, and (2) establishes or designates an agency of the State to accept jurisdiction of cases under section 7 (a) of this act.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to require that the States make a finding that there is discrimination within those States and take some positive step to cooperate with the Federal Government in ridding the State of any such discrimination.

In my opinion, there is abundant precedent in our national laws where the National Government has enacted legislation of this character expecting cooperation of the States.

I shall offer this amendment for the consideration of the Members when and if FEPC legislation comes before us.

Amendment to H. R. 4453 proposed by Mr. LUCAS.

"'EFFECTIVE DATE IN STATES

"'SEC. 16. This act shall take effect in each State on the date on which the State by law (1) declares that the rights of some persons within the jurisdiction of the State to employment without discrimination because of race, color, religion, ancestry, or national origin are being denied, and (2) establishes or designates an agency of the State to accept jurisdiction of cases under section 7 (a) of this act.'"

REFUSAL OF COAL MINERS TO WORK

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Speaker, the Associated Press, in dispatches to its morning clients for today, reported from Pittsburgh that 63,000 miners were refusing to return to the pits, even though the President of the United Mine Workers of America, Mr. John L. Lewis, had so requested. Newspapers variously headlined this dispatch, and one of similar vein yesterday, using the word "rebellion," or a synonym.

This, Mr. Speaker, is significant, especially in relation to that vicious law, the Taft-Hartley Act.

Proponents of that law—and I am certainly not numbered among them—have defended their position by claiming the Taft-Hartley Act is not aimed at workingmen, but at freeing labor from what they assert is dictatorship of labor bosses. This law, they would have us believe, is labor's emancipation.

Now these same proponents also are most vigorous in calling the United Mine Workers' president, Mr. Lewis, a labor boss.

They are also the same individuals who daily, through press and radio and in Congress, are demanding that the Taft-Hartley law be invoked in the coal dispute to force miners back to work.

Mr. Speaker, we have here, according to the Associated Press, which is known as the world's greatest news gathering organization, and which has a high reputation for accuracy, more than 60,000 miners who do not want to go back to work. Now, if the Taft-Hartley law is invoked and these men are forced back to work—assuming that you can make them work against their will—will it be used against a labor boss or will it be used against a group of individual miners who do not want to work without a contract? A group of miners who are striking, not under compulsion from a labor leader, but because their desire to strike is stronger than the requests of their duly elected national head.

The answer, of course, is obvious. Invoking the Taft-Hartley law—still assuming you could force these so-called rebellious miners back to the pits—would be using it against individual workers.

Thus the real purpose of the Taft-Hartley law—its antiunion and anti-worker philosophy—is clearly illustrated. There can be no longer any question about the law, why all labor considers it a slave-labor bill is clearly shown. Supporters of this act can no longer hide behind the smug phrases about curbing labor bosses.

And perhaps, if these miners can be made to work, against their will, by injunction, millionaires, ex-Congressmen, lawyers, and other never-sweats could also be forced to work in industry—also against their will.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RABAUT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. SADOWSKI asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include excerpts.

Mr. LARCADE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial entitled "Real Democrats Given Wrong Name."

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances; to include in one a radio speech, in one a resolution, and in one an editorial.

AMENDING COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill, H. R. 6949, containing several amendments to the radio provisions of the Communications Act of 1934. I believe that the amendments contained in this bill, particularly those dealing with the subject of allocation and assignment of frequencies, go to the very heart of the Communications Act of 1934.

The bill deals with three subjects: First, it would provide for the creation of an independent five-member Frequency Control Board to deal with allocation and assignment of radio frequencies. Secondly, it would give the Federal Communications Commission additional administrative sanctions with respect to radio station licenses and holders of construction permits. Third, it would render radio station licensees immune from criminal or civil actions for statements made in the course of political broadcasts, and would clarify section 315 of the Communications Act relating to such broadcasts.

It is my belief that the subjects dealt with in my bill need intensive study and I believe further that these subjects can be studied better if a concrete proposal is placed on the table for discussion purposes. In introducing this bill, I am simply seeking to place before the Congress, the executive branch of our Government, and all those who are concerned with problems of radio communications such a concrete proposal.

There has been a great deal of pressure emanating from various quarters including the radio trade press that the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, before taking up any of these subjects, should concentrate on S. 1973, the so-called McFarland bill. There are demands even to the effect that the committee should report this bill out without holding any hearings whatsoever.

As stated by the sponsors of S. 1973, their bill deals exclusively with the organizational and procedural provisions of the Communications Act. I believe firmly that the impact of the amendments contained in that bill cannot be properly evaluated by this committee unless it has a thorough understanding of the functions and operations of the Federal Communications Commission in the field of radio.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has not had an opportunity to study these substantive problems since it held its last comprehensive hearings on amendments to the Communications Act in the summer of 1942. Since then, many new problems, I need mention only television, have arisen, and many new members have joined the committee who have never had occasion to study the problems connected with the various aspects of radio and radio communications. I believe it would be unreasonable to expect this committee to do, in connection with the consideration of S. 1973, the kind of job which it is accustomed to do unless the committee first gains a clear understanding of the substantive problems involved. Therefore it is my purpose to bring before the committee some of the most important substantive problems connected with radio and to do that in the most concrete form possible, namely, that of placing before the committee appropriate amendments to the Communications Act in the field of radio. That is the sole reason for my introducing this bill at the present time.

FREQUENCY CONTROL

Title I of the bill would add to title III of the Federal Communications Act of 1934 a new part entitled "Frequency Control."

In 1943 the House of Representatives of the Seventy-eighth Congress passed House Resolution 21, creating a Select committee to investigate the Federal Communications Commission. On January 2, 1945, Hon. Clarence Lea, the chairman of the select committee and also the chairman of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, submitted the select committee's final report. The select committee had gone in great detail into the question of the operation of the Interdepartment Radio Advisory Committee. In reporting on its study and investigation, the committee made the following statement:

> The select committee notes that section 305 of the Federal Communications Act of 1934 places personal responsibility on the President to make assignments to governmental radio stations; and it believes that before such power is delegated to a body with an independent rather than advisory character, the whole problem should be considered by Congress.

Title I of my bill would provide for the creation of an independent body, and I hope that this proposal will thus place before the Congress the very problem that the select committee recommended for study by the Congress.

As stated by the select committee, the Federal Communications Act grants to the President the power to assign radio frequencies to Federal Government stations. The act charges the Federal Communications Commission with the responsibility for the assignment of frequencies to all other stations, including private, State, and local government stations. Within their respective areas, both the President and the Commission have unlimited power to assign frequencies. Neither has authority over the other in this respect.

For many years this machinery was adequate because the uses to which the spectrum was put both by the Government and by non-Government operators were not as varied and as many as they are now. Nor was there any keen rivalry between nations for the use of the same parts of the radio spectrum. As the uses of radio have been increased, however, so has the difficulty of reconciling the actions of these two authorities, namely, the President and the Commission.

The President informally has delegated to the Interdepartment Radio Allocation Committee, known generally as IRAC, his functions of assigning frequencies to Government stations. IRAC has not been established by Executive order but has been created on a voluntary basis by the Government agencies that are using radio. The following are members of IRAC: Army, Navy, Air Force, Commerce, Treasury, Agriculture, Interior, Justice, State, Maritime Commission, and finally the Federal Communications Commission. IRAC has been in existence since 1922, but its membership and organization has never been formalized by Executive order or in any other manner. Nevertheless, it is the recognized public body which exercises on behalf of the President the authority granted in the Communications Act to the President to assign radio frequencies for Federal Government uses.

In apportioning radio frequencies as between the Federal Government and private users (including State and local governments), the Federal Communications Commission and IRAC have dealt with each other pretty much on the same basis that two sovereign governments would deal with each other. Each put forward its particular claims to particular portions of the spectrum, and if any conflict arose as to these claims, they were compromised as best possible.

There is no criticism whatever of this operation. It is the best possible that can be devised to carry out the provisions of the Communications Act of 1934, which established the dual authority of the President and the Federal Communications Commission with respect to the assignment of radio frequencies. As a matter of fact, I feel that both the Federal Communications Commission and IRAC should be congratulated for having operated this inadequate machinery so long without a serious break-down.

However, as I have stated, the demands for space in the radio spectrum both on the part of the Federal Government and private applicants have been increasing constantly. Simultaneously, the difficulty of reconciling the actions of these two authorities has grown. As a matter of fact, the charge has been made publicly that as a result of the inadequacy of this machinery, private applicants for space in the spectrum have come out second best. It has been contended that the Federal Communications Commission has been given to distribute among private applicants that portion of the spectrum that has been left over after the Federal Government agencies took the space that they desired.

This is a serious charge, indeed, and in a democracy it is poor business to leave the apportionment of an important natural resource like the radio spectrum, as between Federal Government and non-Government uses, to a planless system of compromises between two public bodies, each sovereign in its own field, neither of which is responsible to the people for the apportionment that results from their respective actions. And yet, under the Communications Act as it now stands, this procedure is the only possible one.

It is my belief that under our system of government the apportionment of the radio spectrum as between Federal Government and non-Government uses must be entrusted to public officials responsible to the President and the Congress and through them to the people.

I have not been unmindful of the fact that a substantial amount of time is being spent by individual members of the Federal Communications Commission and by the Commission staff on general frequency allocation problems and international negotiations with regard thereto. At the same time, it is well known that the Commission has a large backlog of applications for the assignment of frequencies and hearings with regard thereto whose processing has been delayed for months, and in many instances for years. It is my hope that my proposal to create a Frequency Control Board will so lighten the workload of the Commission that the aforementioned backlog can be eliminated and that the Commission can become current in its work.

Title II of the bill deals with two very important aspects of the Federal Communications Act: First, the question of what administrative sanctions shall be available to the Federal Communications Commission to enforce the radio provisions of the act and the rules and regulations of the Commission. Secondly, what specific requirements shall be imposed on licensees with respect to political broadcasting and, as a consequence thereof, in what instances shall such licensees be immune from actions for libel or slander in connection with statements made in the course of such political broadcasts.

ADMINISTRATIVE SANCTIONS

The Communications Act, in section 312, provides the conditions under which the Commission is authorized to revoke a broadcasting station's license. Revocation of a license is the only sanction given to the Commission to enforce the provisions of the act and the rules and regulations prescribed by the Commission.

The recent decision of the Commission in the case of the Don Lee Broadcasting System well exemplifies the need for additional administrative sanctions less severe than revocation. Here are the words of the Commission:

> We find ourselves in a difficult situation in deciding this case. This is not due to any deficiency in the record for we are convinced that the attitude which responsible Don Lee officers displayed in this record with respect to the Commission's chain broadcasting regulations—an attitude which can at best be characterized as one of indifference—warrants critical examination of the qualifications of the applicant to be a broadcast licensee. We are, however, faced with important practical difficulties in this case which arise from the fact that the only sanction we have the authority to apply is denial of license—an action which will put the licensee out of business. Except in an aggravated case, the Commission is reluctant to impose a sentence on a licensee which not only terminates his existing operations but would preclude him from holding any other radio licenses. Had we the authority to order a suspension, assess a penalty or impose some other sanction less than a "death sentence" we should have no hesitancy whatsoever in doing so in this case.

Commissioner Hennock, who dissented from the decision of the majority to renew, notwithstanding the violations of the Commission network regulations, the station licenses of the applicant, nevertheless agreed with the views of the majority concerning the need for additional sanctions:

> In this connection, I should like to say that I feel as do most of the other members of the Commission, that in some cases we are definitely hampered in the exercise of our regulatory authority by the fact that virtually the only substantial sanction available to us for violation of the Communications Act or our rules and regulations is the deprivation of the broadcast license. Even the other sanctions available are extremely burdensome, and not suited for the day-to-day regulation which the act entrusts to the Commission. It would certainly be salutary for the Congress to give some consideration to the problem here raised, and, if possible to design some other sanctions to add to those already available sanctions of intermediate severity which might be applied more expeditiously.

The first provision of title II of my bill would give the Commission, in addition to the power of revoking a license, the power (1) to suspend a license for a period not to exceed 90 days, (2) to issue cease-and-desist orders, and (3) to order a forfeiture to the United States by a station licensee or holder of a construction permit of not to exceed $500 for each day during which a violation continues.

POLITICAL BROADCASTS

Section 315 of the Communications Act, while leaving station licensees free to determine whether their stations shall be available for political broadcasts, imposes the obligation on licensees who open their stations to any one political candidate to afford equal opportunities to all other political candidates. This section further provides that licensees may not censor any statements made in the course of such political broadcasts.

A serious question has arisen as to whether the obligation to afford equal opportunities on the one hand and the prohibition of censorship on the other hand automatically renders the licensee immune from actions for libel and slander brought on account of any such statements.

It seems to me highly desirable that this matter be clarified by Congress. My bill would render licensees immune from any action in any local, State, or Federal court, based on the material contained in a political broadcast. In addition, the bill would specify in greater detail than is the case in the present section 315 the instances in which the law would impose the obligation on a licensee to afford equal opportunities in the use of such broadcasting station.

SUMMARY OF TITLE I—RADIO FREQUENCY CONTROL

Section 1 of the bill would add a new part, entitled "Part III—Frequency Control" to title III—entitled "Provisions Relating to Radio" of the Communications Act of 1934. It would create a new independent agency in the executive branch of the Government to be known as Frequency Control Board. The Board would consist of five members to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The members of the Board are to be selected solely on the basis of established records of distinguished service in either of the following two fields: (1) Radio and the civilian or military uses of radio, and (2) public affairs.

It would be the function of the Board to formulate such plans and policies with respect to the utilization of the radio spectrum, with particular reference to the apportionment of radio frequencies between Government and non-Government uses, as it deems necessary to accomplish the purposes declared in the Federal Communications Act of 1934. These purposes are to provide for regulating interstate and foreign commerce in communications by wire and radio so as to make available, so far as possible, to all the people of the United States a rapid, efficient, Nation-wide, and world-wide wire, radio, and commmunication service with adequate facilities at reasonable charges; to promote the national defense; and to promote safety of life and property through the use of wire and radio communication.

In order to effectuate such plans and policies, the Board would be authorized and directed to do the following: (1) Allocate frequencies and bands of frequencies and cancel or modify any such allocation; (2) assign frequencies to Government stations and cancel or modify any such assignments; and (3) prescribe regulations to govern the assignment by the Federal Communications Commission of frequencies to non-Government stations.

Finally, the Board would be directed to disapprove the proposed assignment or renewal of assignment of any frequency by the Federal Communications Commission to a non-Government station where such assignment (A) would cause harmful interference to any Government use of radio or (B) would violate any regulation prescribed by the Board with respect to the assignment, by the Federal Communications Commission, of frequencies to non-Government stations.

The bill would create a Military Liaison Committee consisting of representatives of the National Military Establishment detailed or assigned to this committee. The Board would be directed to advise and consult with the committee on the allocation or assignment of radio frequencies required for the purpose of the national defense. If the committee should at any time conclude that any action or failure to act on the part of the Board with respect to the allocation or assignment of radio frequencies for the purpose of national defense would be adverse to the responsibilities of the National Military Establishment, the committee would be authorized to refer such action or failure to act to the Secretary of Defense. If the Secretary concurred with the committee, he would be authorized to refer the matter to the President, whose decision would be final.

The bill would further provide for the appointment by the Board of such advisory committees as the Board deems necessary to advise it on any matters arising in connection with the discharge of the Board's functions.

The Board, acting in accordance with the directions of and subject to the control of the President, would negotiate agreements with foreign governments which affect the allocation and assignment of frequencies. The State Department would be directed to assist the Board in the arrangements for and the conduct of such negotiations.

The Board would be directed, after consultation with the Military Liaison Committee, to establish regulations and procedures for the security classification of information related to the work of the Board and for the proper safeguarding of any information so classified.

The Board would further be directed to render an annual report to the President and the Congress, summarizing the activities of the Board and making appropriate recommendations. Minority views and recommendations, if any, of members of the Board would have to be included in such report.

Section 2 of the bill proposes to rewrite section 1 of the Communications Act, which contains the general declaration of policy and provides for creation of the Federal Communications Commission. The need for rewriting this section arises from the fact that the proposal to create the Frequency Control Board makes it desirable to eliminate from section 1 the language relating to centralization in the Federal Communications Commission of all authority and powers with respect to wire and radio communication. The amendment made by this section does not, of course, affect the membership or organization of the Federal Communications Commission.

Sections 3, 4, and 5 of the bill make other incidental changes in the Communications Act which are necessary in view of the powers proposed to be granted to the Frequency Control Board.

Section 6 of the bill contains saving provisions with respect to allocations and assignments of frequencies made under the law as it now exists.

Section 7 of the bill relates to the time of taking effect of the provisions contained in title I.

SUMMARY OF TITLE II—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS—ADMINISTRATIVE SANCTIONS

Section 201 of the bill would amend section 312 of the Communications Act. Section 312, as amended, would authorize the Federal Communications Commission to revoke any station license, or suspend any station license for a period not to exceed 90 days, and would authorize the Commission to revoke—but not to suspend—any construction permit, for any of the following reasons:

First. For false statements knowingly made either in the application or in any statement of fact which the Commission may require under section 308 of the act.

Second. Because of conditions coming to the attention of the Commission which would warrant it in refusing to grant a license or permit under an original application.

Third. For willful or repeated failure to operate substantially as set forth in the license,

Fourth. For willful or repeated violation of—or failure to observe—any provision of the act or any rule or regulation of the Commission authorized by the act or by a treaty ratified by the United States,

Fifth. Because the station licensee or holder of a construction permit—or any affiliated company—has engaged in a course of conduct designed to persuade, induce, or coerce any other station licensee or holder of a construction permit to do one of the following acts: (A) to violate—or to fail to observe—any of the provisions of the act or any rule or regulation of the Commission; or (B) to engage in any course of conduct which would warrant the Commission in refusing to grant a license or permit to such other station licensee or holder of a construction permit, Sixth. For violation of—or failure to observe—any cease and desist order issued by the Commission.

Section 312, as amended, would further authorize the Commission to order any person to cease and desist from such action where such person

First. Has failed to operate substantially as set forth in his license,

Second. Has violated—or has failed to observe—any of the provisions of the act,

Third. Has violated—or failed to observe—any rule or regulation of the Commission.

In all cases where, under this section, as amended, the Commission would be authorized to suspend or revoke a license, or to revoke a permit, or to issue a cease and desist order, the Commission in lieu of such action—or, in case of a cease and desist order, in addition to such order—may order a licensee or permittee to forfeit to the United States $500—or such lesser sum as the Commission may find appropriate in the light of all the facts and circumstances of the particular case—for each day during which the Commission finds that any offense has occurred.

POLITICAL BROADCASTS

Section 315, as amended, would impose on station licensees the following obligation with respect to political broadcasts:

First. If a licensee permits any legally qualified candidate for public office to use a broadcasting station in furtherance of his candidacy, the licensee must afford equal opportunities in the use of such broadcasting station to each of the other legally qualified candidates for that office or to any person or persons designated by such other candidate.

Second. If a licensee permits any person to use a broadcasting station in support of a legally qualified candidate for public office, the licensee must afford equal opportunities in the use of such broadcasting station to each of the other qualified candidates for that office or to a person or persons designated by each such other candidate.

Third. If a licensee permits any person or persons to use a broadcasting station in opposition to a legally qualified candidate for public office, the licensee must afford equal opportunity in the use of such broadcasting station to the candidate so opposed, or to a person or persons designated by the candidate so opposed.

Fourth. If a licensee permits use of a broadcasting station in support of or in opposition to a public question to be voted upon in any referendum, initiative, recall, or any other form of public election, the licensee must afford equal opportunities in the use of such broadcasting station for the presentation of opposition views on such public question.

Section 315 would leave unchanged, in substance, the provision that a licensee may not censor, alter, or in any manner affect or control the material broadcast by any person whom he permits to use his station in any of the afore-mentioned cases, or who uses such station as a matter of right in accordance with the aforementioned provisions. Section 315 would be amended by providing that in any of these instances the licensee shall not be liable in any civil or criminal action in any local, State, or Federal court because of any statement made in such broadcast. The licensee, however, would remain civilly and criminally liable for any statements made personally by such licensee or by any person who is under his control.

The rule-making function of the Commission with respect to the provisions of this section is retained unchanged. Also, as in case of the present provision, it is left to the discretion of the licensee to determine whether or not initially to make available his station for political broadcasts.

POLIOMYELITIS

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include a newspaper clipping.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, emphasis is now being placed on the campaign to raise funds to fight the awful plague of poliomyelitis.

Surely there is no more worthy cause than of promoting every possible effort to discover a preventive or cure from the dreaded disease of polio. All of us are in the fight to win, and we simply must reach our objective.

In this connection, I call attention to the attached Associated Press release of yesterday, in which it is pointed out our State of South Carolina has been more fortunate than any of the other States in that we had less polio per capita in 1949. Our percentage of cases was 5.4 per 100,000 population, the lowest of all the States.

We very humbly give thanks for this favored position of our State, and pledge ourselves to continue to battle for the day when all of our States may be safe from this terrible disease.

The release is as follows:

NEW YORK, January 21.—Idaho led the Nation last year in the percentage of polio cases, the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis announced today.

There were 511 cases in the State, or 86.3 cases per 100,000 persons. The national figure was 42,375 cases, or 28.5 per 100,000 population.

South Carolina was the most polio-free State. There were only 109 cases there, or 5.4 per 100,000 residents.

The figures were announced as the foundation pushed its March of Dimes compaign after a record high polio year in 1949.

"Infantile paralysis is shown not only to be on the rise but outbreaks are becoming more general than sporadic," the foundation said.

Some $31,000,000 was spent on care and treatment alone by the foundation last year, its report disclosed.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to address the House today for 10 minutes, following any special orders heretofore entered.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LODGE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances, and include extraneous material.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include newspaper articles, editorials, and letters.

Mr. GOODWIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in five instances and include extraneous material.

FORMOSA

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include a short newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, some days ago I suggested that the Speaker call the Secretary of National Defense and the Secretary of State to appear before the Members of Congress in order that they might give us more information regarding the conditions in Formosa and in the Far East. In this Associated Press news item I have in my hand which appeared in the Lowell Sun, Saturday, January 21, Secretary Acheson said at a luncheon in the Senate restaurant that President Truman very likely would sit in at the defense hearings. Certainly, if the President is to sit in at defense hearings, the Members of Congress ought to be given all the facts regarding our national defense in Formosa and other places. We are responsible for the defense of America. We are the ones who vote to send our boys to war if war is ever declared.

The article I referred to reads as follows:

HARRY S. TRUMAN MAY SIT IN WASHINGTON.—President Truman may be invited to sit in on a forthcoming briefing of Senators by defense leaders on the world military situation.

Secretary of Defense Johnson was reported to have told Senators who lunched with him at his Pentagon offices yesterday that Mr. Truman is vitally interested and may meet with the Senators if he can find the time.

Armed Services Committee members said they were told that some time after February 14 they will be invited to listen to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, headed by Gen. Omar N. Bradley, review the world military situation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DONDERO asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the coal shortage at Pontiac, Mich., and include a report from the Coal Dealers Association of that city.

Mr. REED of New York asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in five instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. MASON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject The Real Issue This Fall and include therein an article along the same line by Samuel J. Kornhauser, of the Cleveland bar, on Why Labor Leaders Assail Senator ROBERT A. TAFT.

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LECOMPTE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a set of resolutions of the Lucas County, Iowa, Farm Bureau.

Mr. GAVIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. DOLLIVER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a tribute to Gen. H. H. Arnold by Paul A. Johnson, a constituent of his.

Mr. JAVITS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include extraneous matter.

MUST WE WAIT FOR A CATASTROPHE?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, the sections of the labor-management relations law dealing with strikes imperiling the national health or safety are entitled "National Emergencies." Whenever the President thinks "a threatened or actual strike or walk-out affecting an entire industry or a substantial part thereof * * * will, if permitted to occur or continue, imperil the national health or safety," he is authorized to appoint a board of inquiry to inquire into the issues involved in the dispute and make a written report to him about them. Then, after he receives this report, if he feels the situation is sufficiently critical, he is authorized to direct the Attorney General to petition the court to enjoin the continuance of such a strike for a 60-day period. After this period is up or if the parties reach a settlement in the meantime, then, under the law, the Attorney General must ask the court to end the injunction. Before the court acts, it, like the President, must affirmatively find that the strike affects an entire industry or substantial part of it and will imperil the national health and safety if it is permitted to continue.

The very purpose of these provisions is to prevent a national emergency from developing into a national catastrophe.

Yet the unwillingness of the President to lift a finger in the face of the danger now facing our Nation due to the coal shortage, daily brings us nearer to the brink of a national disaster.

Reliable information has reached me that today the Gas & Electric Co. in my home city of Rochester, N. Y., has only 14 days of coal stocks for gas and only 21 days for electric and steam needs. It is stated that if a severe snow storm or cold spell should develop, real hardship would immediately result. Historically, the next 3 weeks are usually the most severe of the winter.

If the Nation's coal supply gave out tomorrow, the wheels of industry would stop, men and women would walk the streets out of jobs, our homes, our hospitals, our factories and our office buildings would be without heat or light, in most cases we would be unable to cook our food, any refrigeration run by electricity would stop, our trains would stop running, our schools and churches would have to close, and thousands of other activities would cease. The results flowing from a stoppage of gas, electricity and steam are simply unthinkable in our complex, modern life. Perhaps it is unfortunate that our economy is so dependent on coal supplies, but there is no escape from that fact.

My information is that the normal supply of coal stocks which a gas and electric company carries is about 45 to 60 days. In other words, these stocks are down to one-fourth to one-third of normal for gas and one-third and one-half of normal for electricity and steam. Due to this emergency situation, I have presented this serious problem to the Chief Executive urging that he take appropriate action immediately to prevent the national disaster which would follow from running out of coal. The Congress has provided the President with the necessary machinery to protect the jobs, the comfort and the lives of our people and to prevent the unemployment and suffering which must shortly flow from his failure to act. The responsibility rests squarely with him. It is too serious a situation to receive purely political treatment.

It should be borne in mind that even if the President acts today and appoints a board of inquiry it will take that board several days to assemble, make official inquiry into the dispute, and prepare its findings for a report back to the President. In other words, necessarily under the law, it will be a substantial number of days before coal production could be resumed, even if the President acts at once.

The action taken this week by the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board must not be allowed to fool anyone. It is directed to alleged unfair labor practices and, at a maximum, could only result in a court order restraining such practices. It has nothing to do with the national emergency which the country faces. It is not designed to be, nor could it be, an effective means for restoring full production of coal.

Daily we approach closer to the brink of a catastrophe. It is difficult to conceive of a more genuine peril to the national well-being than the situation we face today.

This is a frank and earnest appeal to my colleagues in the House, regardless of political affiliation, to join in urging that the President take immediate action. I do not know the situation in other communities than my own. I do know from reliable information that conditions there are critical and acute.

If the President, for political reasons or otherwise, does not wish to proceed under the terms of a law which he vetoed, he should act under the inherent powers which he contends that he has to meet such an emergency situation as now confronts the Nation. The House will remember that one of the reasons which he gave for opposing the provisions of existing law dealing with national emergencies, was that such provisions are not necessary, due to the fact that he possesses all of the power he needs by virtue of his office. Certainly this power, if it exists, should now be exercised. I appeal to my colleagues to exert every legitimate influence on the Chief Executive to convince him of the need for action.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a telegram.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, the message which the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEATING] has just brought to the House is in keeping with the thoughts of every Member here who comes from the northern part of the country where the weather is cold, where blizzards are raging, and where the people are suffering because they have no heat. Tolerance is a splendid virtue, but there comes a time when even tolerance reaches its limit.

For weeks the coal situation has been growing steadily and rapidly more desperate, yet the President obstinately opines that there "is no emergency yet," and, therefore, refuses to use the Taft-Hartley law provided him by the Congress to supply coal where coal is desperately needed.

On January 12 I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 163, requesting the President to act, and explained the necessity for action on his part. Those remarks will be found on page 360 of the RECORD of January 12. Since that date conditions have grown steadily worse, yet the President is apparently blind to the situation. There is no immediate action that the Congress can take that will get coal. There is immediate action the President can take that will get coal.

Illustrative of the situation in Michigan, permit me to read a copy of a telegram this day sent to President Truman:

DEAR PRESIDENT TRUMAN: The coal situation in Ypsilanti, Mich, has assumed critical proportions. One of our six coal dealers is now entirely out of supply and none expected. The remaining five have less than a week's supply. Four of our industries have less than a week's supply on hand. Three others have less than 2 weeks' supply. Michigan State Normal College is on emergency basis, lowering pressure and rationing heat. City Hospital is on day-to-day rationing by one of the five local dealers. Ypsilanti State Hospital uses one car per day, and is down to a 3-day supply.

I appeal to you for assistance. An emergency does certainly exist in Ypsilanti. Any further shut-down in industry would aggravate an already serious unemployment problem and would create an untenable situation in the life of our community. May I hear from you, please? Thank you.

Respectfully yours,

DAN T. QUIRK,
Mayor, City of Ypsilanti, Mich.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to include a letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I understand the State premiere of the picture "When Willie Comes Marching Home" will be shown in Punxsutawney, Pa., the one and only Punxsutawney in the United States, on February 4, 1950. The picture deals with Punxatawney, W. Va., and Colleen Townsend is the star.

Now, everybody knows that there is no such place as Punxatawney, W. Va., and I understand that West Virginia is working up a lot of ballyhoo trying to change the name of some village down there so that they might have legitimate claim to the film's first appearance in the East.

Certainly I want to register objection to West Virginia's effort to grab the fair name and fame of Punxsutawney, Pa.—the only Punxsutawney that is in existence anywhere is Punxsutawney, Pa., a town well known to every American. Punxsutawney is the home of that great prognosticator of the weather, the groundhog, and you will hear from him on February 2, Groundhog Day.

I am presenting herewith a letter received from the Punxsutawney Chamber of Commerce directed to the Copyright Office of the Library of Congress requesting necessary forms and applications for copyrighting the name of Punxsutawney to protect the name against the infringement of those who would like to reflect in the glories of that great groundhog city, Punxsutawney, Pa.

PUNXSUTAWNEY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Punxsutawney, Pa., January 18, 1950.

COPYRIGHT OFFICE,
LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C.

SIRS: On the above date this organization dispatched a telegram to your offices applying for copyright of the name "Punxsutawney" which has been the proper name of our municipality for more than 100 years.

It was stated in the telegram that we were airmailing necessary forms and applications to properly apply for this copyright and thereby prevent other municipalities from adopting our name. However, we later learned that these forms were only available from your Department.

Please forward necessary forms and applications immediately so that we may institute proceedings to protect the name of our city from upstart municipalities seeking to use this name for publicity purposes.

For more than a century our city has been recognized nationally as the city from which eminates the annual groundhog weather prediction and it is our contention that this name by virtue of honorable usage over the years be made exclusively ours.

We would deeply appreciate your forwarding forms and your valued advice in this matter posthaste.

Sincerely yours,

PUNXSUTAWNEY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES COMMISSION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, after the events of Friday and yesterday, it is to be hoped that there will be a cessation of claims about a mandate that the people gave the administration on civil rights in the Presidential election of 1948. The Rules Committee was denied its old powers on Friday, and the road was kept open for FEPC only because 64 Republicans voted "No." The majority on that vote was 53; hence without Republican votes the rules would have been changed and the chance for FEPC probably ended for this Congress.

It should be clear by now what kind of mandate there is on civil rights. It is a mandate from the people which runs to every Member and not to any party. It is a question of individual record and not party responsibility. The only sure hope for passage of FEPC is a bipartisan coalition of liberal Democrats and progressive Republicans who will by discharge petition bring FEPC to the floor, if it is not otherwise brought before us by the next discharge day.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CUNNINGHAM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

Mr. JENSEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter from James Boyd, Director of the Bureau of Mines.

AMERICA'S COAL SUPPLIES

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, because so many different figures have been given the American people as to the supplies of coal above ground, I took it upon myself to ask Dr. Boyd, the Director of the Bureau of Mines, a few days ago when he appeared before our Subcommittee on Appropriations to give us the real facts as to exactly how many tons of coal were now above the ground, and in the hands of the retail coal dealers. According to Dr. Boyd, who knows because he is required by law to publish such facts and figures, on January 1 last past there was only 4 days' supply of coal in the hands of the coal dealers of the Nation, and the supply is dwindling day by day. The situation does not seem to worry President Truman, who has the power under laws passed by Congress to solve it. Thousands of our people are now suffering from the lack of coal. Must people freeze to death before the President acts?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

ALGER HISS

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, the present administration's keen and unfailing sense of bad judgment has been again sustained with the conviction of Alger Hiss, which stamps that worthy both a liar and a spy. The former "bright boy" of the State Department, confidant and one-time adviser of highly placed administration officials was last Saturday found guilty in the New York Federal Court on two counts of perjury. The finding of the jury was made in spite of frantic efforts on the part of many highly placed officials in the present administration to prevent the case ever coming to court. Hiss was the leading exponent of policies which have led to disaster in China. Together with others of like mind in the Department of State he advocated long ago the abandonment of our Chinese allies. He was part and parcel of the international conspiracy which sought a world-wide vote of no confidence in the Chinese Nationalist Government. He was a mental carpetbagger who served the cause of world communism with vigor, with energy, and with enthusiasm. His conviction will certainly meet with the approval of all good Americans.

Congratulations and the thanks of all America are due Judge Henry W. Goddard, who presided at the Hiss trial, to the jury which made the finding, to Prosecutor Murphy, and to our own distinguished colleagues, Representative RICHARD NIXON, of California, and Senator KARL MUNDT, of South Dakota, who almost single-handed forced the present administration to bring the Hiss case to trial.

The American people themselves will decide whether or not such trials are worth while or whether the President was being honest or just political in branding investigations of this kind as "hysteria and a red herring."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mrs. ST. GEORGE asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include a letter and a report from a dairy farmer in her district.

Mr. VELDE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

COAL CRISIS

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, during the past few weeks I have been receiving numerous complaints about the coal shortage in the Fifth Congressional District in Michigan as well as in other sections of my great State. The complaints have become more numerous due to the wave of cold weather which has gripped the Midwest during this time. As an example, I should like to read to the House a telegram and an excerpt from a letter which I received a few days ago:

Although we have about 30 days' supply of coal we have been notified by St. Joseph Lead Co., Josephtown, Pa., that they cannot ship zinc oxide after Friday this week. Also notified by Pennsylvania Industrial Chemical Corp., Clairton, Pa., and the Neville Co., Neville Island, Pittsburgh, Pa., that they are both shutting down January 20. Without supply of raw materials we cannot operate. What do you mean there is no coal emergency?

The excerpt from the letter reads as follows:

Because of the coal situation which has prevailed for some months past, we have been unable to store up stocks of coal adequate for reasonable insurance against curtailment, or perhaps, entire stoppage of our plant activities, involving employment of over 2,500 employees. No doubt our own situation is paralleled in innumerable cases all over the country.

I want to go on record and state that the present coal crisis is not a dream as the executive branch of our Government seems to think, but rather a diabolical reality of pain and suffering as well as economic instability. The situation is grave now and is becoming more so with each passing day. It is a well-known fact that there is a pressing need for domestic fuel and if conditions do not change human suffering will prevail.

This question may be asked in the crisis. Does John L. Lewis control the economic destiny of our country? One would seem to think so judging from the conduct of our executive department. As one of my colleagues said a few days ago, and I quote:

This is no time to toy with words, to play politics, or to try to escape responsibility because of technicalities. Affirmative and decisive action is essential on the part of the President. Joe Stalin may control Russia, but John L. Lewis must not be permitted to control the United States. The Taft-Hartley law may have its defects but certainly it contains language giving ample authority to the President and the executive agencies to intervene in behalf of our people and put an end to this emergency which is not only already a calamity but, in many instances, disastrous.

That, gentleman, is my sentiment.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FORD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter from a constituent.

HON. ISAAC BACHARACH

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, I trespass upon the time of the House for the very pleasant purpose of advising the membership that my distinguished predecessor, the Honorable Isaac Bacharach, of Atlantic City, recently celebrated his eightieth birthday.

The senior Members of the House, in particular, will welcome the news that our friend and former colleague is still enjoying good health and an active life.

Congressman Bacharach served the Second Congressional District of New Jersey in this great body for 22 years. His representation of our district was exceptionally meritorious. The magazine Time once characterized him as one of the most influential men in the Capitol. He was a warm personal friend of the late and great Speaker, Nicholas Longworth, and I am sure an equally warm friend of our present beloved Speaker.

One of the things that made his birthday very happy was messages of friendship from his former colleagues, and particularly from the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

My own friendship with Ike Bacharach has been of more than 20 years' duration. I rejoice, as I know you do, in his continued health and happiness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. STEFAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include newspaper editorials.

Mr. ANDERSON of California (at the request of Mr. HALLECK) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include an editorial and a petition.

Mr. HOEVEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a table.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Illinois asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and insert an article.

Mr. HARVEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. NORBLAD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two instances and to include extraneous matter in each instance.

Mr. SADLAK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

Mr. SMITH of Kansas asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

DRIED EGGS

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, Secretary Brannan is sponsoring a new kind of give-away program costing the taxpayers well over a million dollars a week. Stranger still, neither the farmer or the consumer benefits. Ten days ago, the Commodity Credit Corporation purchased 753,630 pounds of dried eggs, and last week they purchased 1,530,490 pounds of dried eggs. Both purchases were made at a cost of 96 cents a pound. This does not include storage or handling. The CCC owns over 73,000,000 pounds of dried eggs, most of which are close to 2 years old. Secretary Brannan is incidentally offering these same dried eggs for export at 40 cents a pound and is getting no takers.

The egg driers are supposed to pay the farmer 25 cents a dozen, actual prices in the Midwest are 18–20 cents a dozen. The trick is that the Department of Agriculture permits the egg drier to average his purchases during the life of the program, which, in the past, has been the whole year. The program as now set up and continued by Secretary Brannan is a complete waste of the taxpayers' money. There is just no market for dried eggs; the British who were forced to eat them during the war, have refused them even as a gift. But Secretary Brannan insists on buying and storing more millions of pounds of dried eggs in the Kansas cave until it will be necessary to dump them. The cost of the dried eggs in terms of shell eggs as purchased from the farmer is 32 cents a dozen. The present program should be terminated immediately, and a program for the purchase of shell eggs substituted that will assure the farmer his full support price and stop the waste of good food that could be used by the millions now on welfare or unemployment rolls.

OIL DEPLETION PROVISION OF INCOME-TAX LAW

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, like many of the oil producers in the United States, I was shocked by President Truman's attack on the depletion provision in the income-tax law which applies to oil and gas production. All natural resource industries have such a taxation principle. It is a bit complex, and therefore the President may have missed its meaning, but the Congress which first put the provision into the law and the others which have since reviewed and approved the operation of the depletion allowance have had no difficulty with it. They proceeded, however, on the evidence and not upon the prejudices and ambitions of a few tax gatherers and tax spenders.

I do not believe that the President is hostile to the oil industry but a course of action based on ignorance can be as harmful as one of malicious intent. I feel certain that the oil men have no doubt that through appropriate hearings the present Congress will conclude as did those of the past that the depletion provision is in the public interest. It is too bad though that a busy industry and a busy Congress must waste time threshing the same straw that has been threshed so many times before.

THE EGG SITUATION

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks and include a letter and some telegrams.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, on December 27 I addressed a letter to Secretary Brannan which reads as follows:

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: A copy of your announcement of December 21 of a support program for eggs in 1950 has just reached my desk. I note that this program calls for approximately 75 percent of the modernized parity. What steps have you taken to assure the operation of this support, low as it is?

Today eggs are selling for 20 cents per dozen in southwestern Minnesota and producers in the Seventh Congressional District are losing approximately $15,000 daily because there is no established market for eggs. Your Department has had ample time to work up a price-support program and it should have been ready for announcement by December 1. Today there is chaos because of this delay.

Since your announcement of last Wednesday, the 21st, nothing concrete in the line of actual support buying has been done in southwestern Minnesota with the exception of the continuance of the contracts under the 1949 program with egg driers for the balance of this month.

I am asking that you immediately institute an effective program of egg-price support and that program must, in my opinion, call for the offer by the Department to buy eggs in the shell, based on grade, directly at the producing points throughout the egg surplus area of the United States. I have been urging Mr. Trigg, Administrator of the Commodity Credit Corporation, and others in the Department, to take this action for the past 3 weeks. Awaiting your early reply, I remain.

To date I have not had the courtesy of a response from Mr. Brannan.

Mr. Speaker, the egg producers and poultry men in my district are beginning to lose confidence in the Department's administration of the support program provided by Congress. The situation is grave and unless something concrete is done to alleviate it immediately, I believe Congress should take steps to enforce the law which it passed for the protection of the American farmer.

I ask leave, at this point, to include a number of wires which I have received within the last 2 days, and which will serve to point this situation up to the House Membership.

PARITY PRICE OF EGGS

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of my colleagues to a situation that exists at this time. The parity price of eggs on January 15, 1950, was and is 51.6 cents per dozen. Eggs in the Midwest are 20 cents per dozen at this time. That is 39 percent of parity.

Eggs in the Midwest were 20 cents per dozen in November 1932 when Mr. Hoover was defeated for President. The parity price as figured by Mr. R. E. Johnson, of the BAE, for November 1932 was 25.8 cents per dozen. This was 77 percent of parity. Are the egg producers back to where they started? Or further back yet?

How much longer are you going to allow this situation to exist? How much longer are we going to have this kind of situation in these days when we are tossing millions and billions of dollars all around the world?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

THE PRICE OF EGGS

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. Mr. Speaker, I have been hearing about eggs this morning—the price of eggs, the disposition of dried eggs. I know eggs are too cheap. I know the price the farm woman is receiving for her eggs is a disgrace, but I do not see how we can blame Secretary Brannan for it. The only thing Secretary Brannan has the power to do, the only thing the Department of Agriculture can do, the only thing Commodity Credit Corporation can do, under the law, is to go into the markets and attempt to buy enough eggs to make an artificial scarcity and hereby hope to raise the price to 27 or 30 or 35 cents, whatever place they attempt to stabilize the farm price of eggs. Secretary Brannan wanted to do something about situations like this, but this House absolutely refused to allow him to even give his plan a trial. Let us not now blame him for our own shortcomings.

REREFERENCE OF BILL

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 2932) for the relief of Horace J. Fenton was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. A like bill offered in the Senate was referred to the Committee on Armed Services of that body, and the bill was passed by the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be rereferred to the Committee on Armed Services.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF THE TERM OF CERTAIN PATENTS

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 4692) to provide for the extension of the term of certain patents of persons who served in the military or naval forces of the United States during World War II, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. BRYSON, WILLIS, and BOGGS of Delaware.

ALGER HISS

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, regarding Alger Hiss, Secretary of State Dean Acheson made the statement that "Alger Hiss is my friend, and I do not give my friendship lightly." He might well have added, "or wisely."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. O'BRIEN of Michigan asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an article by Mr. O. R. Strackbein.

Mr. SULLIVAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an article from the January issue of the Railway Journal of the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees.

Mr. BIEMILLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two separate instances and in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. GORE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two separate instances, in one to include an article by Mr. Robert F. Jones, Commissioner of the Federal Communications Commission, and in the other an address by Mr. Allan B. Kline, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation.

Mr. PRICE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial from the Washington Post.

Mr. CLEMENTE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Mr. HOLIFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

Mr. CELLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Mr. CANFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of civil defense and include an editorial from the New York Times of today.

LAFAYETTE COLLEGE, AN INSTITUTION IN THE TRUE AMERICAN TRADITION

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the founding fathers of this country were successful in establishing a great Nation because it was based primarily on the principle of democracy and a true understanding of toleration which took deep roots among the American people for these many generations. Racial or religious discrimination was regarded by them as the poison which was driving the Old World in Europe to its doom, as the evil heritage of the Dark Ages which knew only hatred for those who stemmed from a different race or expressed their concept of God by a different ritual.

Here in this new country, where the founding fathers were building a new life and a new civilization which is today the envy of the entire world, they wanted no part or parcel of that evil heritage of the Old World. Since 1776 this country has been markedly successful in abiding by the principles of democracy and toleration. The peddlers of racial and religious hatred were never able to make great inroads among our people, who still regard freedom and equality as the highest expression of American ideals.

I am prompted to make these remarks by the recent happenings at Lafayette College, Easton, Pa. This college is named in honor of that great Frenchman, the Marquis de Lafayette, whose services to our country at the time of the American Revolution are known to every school child in the United States and who was also known as a fighter for religious tolerance in his day. When the college was recently bequeathed the sum of $140,000 by an individual who stipulated that no Jewish or Catholic students should benefit from it, the board of trustees refused to accept the bequest because of this discriminatory clause.

The action of Lafayette College is highly commendable because it is in the spirit of American ideals as understood by the founders of this country and it is also in the spirit of the life and thinking of Lafayette. I trust this action on the part of Lafayette College will serve as a reminder to those college authorities who still practice discrimination against students who represent minority groups. They should have the moral backbone to admit to themselves that they are violating the teaching of God as well as the precepts and the spirit of American ideals and American tradition. They then would take the necessary steps to amend their wrongful practices.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MULTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include extraneous matter.

SHIPMENT OF BENZINE TO THE FAR EAST

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have a bit of information here that I think will be interesting to the Members of the House. On January 8 the United States tanker Kettleman-Hills sailed through the Suez Canal en route to the Far East destined for Tsingtao, China. This tanker is loaded with benzine and is one of several ships that is destined for Communist China.

Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if these shipments have the approval of the State Department.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANKIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement by Mr. David M. Brown, national commander of the Disabled Veterans.

TREASON AT YALTA—ONE OF MOST TERRIBLE BLUNDERS IN HISTORY

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, when Congress convened in 1945 I secured the adoption of an amendment to the rules making the Committee on Un-American Activities a standing committee of the House.

That committee has done more to expose the enemies within our gates than any other agency of this Government, or probably every other agency.

I have kept quiet until the Hiss trial was over, which took a year and a $1,000,000 expenditure and finally resulted in the conviction of Hiss, which proved to the American people that there was a conspiracy, a treasonable cabal, if you please, that dominated the Yalta Conference.

President Roosevelt was a sick man, mentally and physically, at Yalta, yet this same cabal with its far-reaching influences misled President Truman into committing one of the most terrible blunders in history by ordering General Patton and his Third Army to move south away from in front of Berlin, after the Germans in Berlin had raised the white flag of surrender, and turned the victory our boys had won over to Communist Russia, the worst enemy civilization has ever known.

I hope the Committee on Un-American Activities will renew the investigation of that treasonable cabal, expose every individual and every organization connected with it; so that Congress can drive them from power and save our country from the wreck and ruin which they and their Communist cohorts have been planning for the last 15 years.

FEPC LEGISLATION

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, in the light of what happened on yesterday, I would like at this time to set forth the four avenues that are left open to those of us who are advocating enactment of FEPC.

First, of course, is continuation of the struggle in the Rules Committee;

Second, insistence on bringing up the FEPC bill under the 21-day rule;

Third, the discharge petition; and Fourth, Calendar Wednesday.

We must avail ourselves of all four. I shall continue to object to dispensing with Calendar Wednesday and I shall object to any unanimous consent to adjourn the House over Wednesday. It is the duty of all friends of FEPC to be on the floor throughout the day on Wednesday and vote down all motives to adjourn and block the filibuster moves of the opponents of FEPC. We may as well face it, gentlemen, irrespective of the maneuverings that are going on in this House, the American people are going to have their way with respect to FEPC. The majority of the American people want it. All attempts to negate their will will fail, because on this issue more than on any other issue the American people will make themselves heard. The people will win this fight despite the Truman double talk and the maneuvers of the leaderships of the Democratic and Republican Parties.

LILLIAN VAN STEENBURGH

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I submit the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 416), and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to the estate of Lillian Van Steenburgh, late an employee of the House of Representatives, an amount equal to 6 months' salary at the rate she was receiving at the time of her death, and an additional amount not to exceed $350 toward defraying the funeral expenses of the said Lillian Van Steenburgh.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand from the gentlewoman from New Jersey that these are unanimous reports from the committee?

Mrs. NORTON. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF THE HEARINGS RELATIVE TO THE FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICE ACT HEARINGS

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I submit the following privileged resolution (H. Con. Res. 152), and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That, in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Education and Labor, House of Representatives, be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to have printed for its use 1,000 additional copies of the hearings held before a special subcommittee of said committee relative to the Federal Fair Employment Practice Act.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL LABORER

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I submit the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 414), and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That effective January 1, 1950, there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, compensation for the employment of one additional laborer (cloakroom), Doorkeeper's Department, at the basic salary rate of $1,380 per annum.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution which I have introduced today be inserted in the RECORD after the remarks which I am about to make.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LODGE] is recognized for 30 minutes.

OUR CHINA POLICY

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a resolution of inquiry into certain aspects of American foreign policy in the Far East and with particular reference to Formosa. I have asked for this time in order to give my colleagues a brief statement as to why I have done this.

It must be quite obvious that the Soviet Union is proceeding with great speed and efficiency with its plan of world conquest. Already more than 800,000,000 people are ruled by the Kremlin despots. At the end of the war they ruled over less than 200,000,000 people. It is also quite obvious that, whatever our excuses may be, we have failed completely to stop Communist aggression in the Far East. I need hardly point out that the conquest of the mainland of China by the Communists and the decision of the President to do nothing other than ECA aid to help the anti-Communists on Formosa, constitutes a threat not only to the nations of southeast Asia, to Indochina, Siam, Malaya, Indonesia, and Burma, but also to the American chain of island defenses, Okinawa, the Philippines, and Japan. Certainly the quite moderate success which we have achieved in the cold war in western Europe will soon be threatened with destruction by events in the Far East unless the United States decides to take some action. Surely whatever else may be said in favor of the President's far eastern policy, it cannot be asserted that it is calculated to stop the ominous threat of Communist aggression. Rather, it relies on the elements of self-destruction which, it is hoped, are implicit in the Communist movement.

I suggest to you most forcefully that it is time that we found reasons why we can do things in our own interest rather than to search for reasons why we can do nothing to protect American national security in the Far East and safeguard the peace of the world.

I venture the thought that there are four principal elements of power: First, there is industrial capacity, and in this the United States stands supreme. No nation has come even close to our mass-production methods. The United States and the nations of western Europe contain the world's great workshops. Second, there is the element of population. Here the Communists have overcome the western democracies. Third is territory. Here, too, the Communists are reaching out apace. Fourth is the element of raw materials. Here, also, the Communists are making great progress. What are we to draw from this brief analysis? It is quite obvious that if the Communists achieve predominance in population, territory, and raw materials, they can in time overcome our lead in industrial capacity. It is also clear that the nations of western Europe need raw materials in order to rehabilitate their economies. These are the remorseless facts of the world we live in.

And so it has seemed to me useful that a matter of such grave importance to the people of the United States should be ventilated on the floor of the House in order to expose it to public view.

In his January 5, 1950, statement on Formosa, the President describes the war in China as a civil war. Yet, the Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, in his letter of transmittal of the white paper to the President, states that the war in China is a war of foreign domination which has been "masked behind the facade of a vast crusading movement." Surely this contradiction between the President and the Secretary of State needs clarifying. Surely, also, we are entitled to know, since we are the people who appropriate the dollars for our foreign policy, why it is that the President made his statement on Formosa prior to the return from that area of Dr. Philip Jessup, who, as you will recall, was appointed by the President to be the head of the commission to investigate the far-eastern situation and make recommendations which might serve as a basis for a useful foreign policy. Furthermore, why did the President make his statement on Formosa before the Joint Chiefs of Staff had returned from the survey tour which they are scheduled to make in February? Would not the Communist conquest of Formosa and Hainan with the rice and iron ore which these islands produce result in substantially increasing the cost to the American taxpayers of the occupation of Japan? Why is it impracticable to resort to the same type of operation in Formosa which is a hundred miles off the mainland of China as we resorted to so successfully in Greece which is attached to the mainland of Europe? Why has the Truman doctrine, which is world-wide in its statement of aims, been abandoned in the Far East?

These are but a few of the questions which I believe should be clarified, and, in an attempt to rescue something of what has been referred to as the bipartisan foreign policy, I have introduced this questionnaire in order that my colleagues on both sides of the aisle should have the information to which they are entitled as participants in the implementation of foreign policies. If I refer to the bipartisan foreign policy in this fashion, it is because, as far as I know, no Republicans have been consulted regarding our policy in the Far East. This circumstance is somewhat difficult to understand, since, if our foreign policy in China had been the result of bipartisan consultations, then surely the Republicans would have to share with the Democrat administration some of the blame for the present awful cataclysm. There is, unfortunately, plenty of blame, and it is all at the doorstep of the executive branch.

My desire, however, is not to recriminate but to help to retrieve the situation insofar as we can. In view of the unconvincing and lamentable state of our far-eastern policy, I think it would be just as well for the consultation to be somewhat broad. I propose to include the Congress of the United States and through them the people whom we represent.

The suggestion has been made that the Chinese will eventually become so angry over the annexation of Manchuria, Outer Mongolia, Inner Mongolia, and Sinkiang that Mao Tse-tung and his followers will have great trouble. We are also being exhorted to do nothing which could possibly deflect that anger onto the United States. In other words, although we know of Communist methods, although we are aware of the reign of terror which they have saddled on the long-suffering Chinese, we should, for fear of incurring the displeasure of the Chinese people, do nothing to help them to "throw off the foreign yoke" which is the phrase used by Mr. Acheson in his letter of transmittal of the white paper. It is apparently just as well for the anti-Communists to be defeated by the Communists; but because we recognize that Chinese communism is an arm of Russian imperialism and therefore is hostile to the real interests of the people of China, the Chinese people will revolt without the aid of the anti-Communists who are still fighting Russian imperialism. Indeed, it is now a cornerstone of United States far-eastern policy that we must rely mainly on Chinese anger for the deliverance of the Chinese people and the removal of this particular threat to American national security and to world peace. This theory is, let us say, more clever in defense of the errors of the administration than it is useful in forging an affirmative, constructive Asiatic foreign policy in a turbulent and dangerous world. It has been said that the State Department has an investment in defeat.

Perhaps the anger of the people of Poland has not yet filtered through to the Department of State. Is it really thought that the Polish people are pleased with their condition of life? Perhaps the State Department has not yet heard of the helpless anger and indignation existing among the people of Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania, of Hungary, of Bulgaria and Rumania, and of Czechoslavakia and Albania. Should we then have allowed Hitler to conquer the world relying upon the anger of the people in his concentration camps to carry on a successful revolt? Surely the people of Manchuria and Outer Mongolia, surely the people of China, are not the only people capable of anger or are they perhaps the only ones who can defeat the machine guns and bayonets, the prisons and concentration camps, the torture and slavery of the Soviet state with the power of unarmed and defenseless anger. And while, of course, we must not arouse the anger of the Chinese while we are to a great extent engaged in a battle for men's minds, it is also true that the battle will not be won by a passive acceptance of Communist conquests.

The dialectical devices, the tailor-made logic and the artful sophistries with which the Department of State has attempted to cover up its own clumsy efforts to form a coalition government in China are a far cry from the brilliant and resourceful statesmanship shown by the late Congressman Anson Burlingame who was sent by Abraham Lincoln as Minister to Peking. He not only opposed the partition of China which was later accomplished at Yalta with our participation and connivance, but, although the diplomatic representatives in Peking were far more experienced than he, it was his leadership which brought about the cooperation expressed by the agreement among the ministers to withstand the pressure of the treaty-port merchants. It was his foresight and courage which resulted in the suppression of the Taiping rebellion. It was he who was responsible for the policy which was aptly referred to as "based upon justness and free from prejudice of race." And it was on July 28, 1868, that Burlingame and Secretary of State Seward signed a convention which pledged the American Government to respect Chinese sovereignty. Certainly our present China policy is distressingly different from these statesmanlike accomplishments of the Lincoln administration plagued as it was by a cruel civil war. Certainly we have come a long way from the enlightened and forceful precepts on which we acted in connection with the Boxer Rebellion.

Of course there is resentment among the peoples of the Far East against alien domination and it is most devoutly to be hoped that the annexation by Soviet Russia of China's four northern provinces will convince the people of China, if they are not already convinced, of the true intentions of the Soviet Union. Moreover, conditions in China are far different from conditions in Europe. And yet it is quite obvious that had we been afraid of what people in Europe would say about us we would not have provided military aid to Greece and Turkey when they were threatened, we would never have enacted the Marshall plan, and we would certainly have shied clear of the Atlantic Treaty and military aid.

It is by no means clear that any of these measures have increased our popularity in the areas in which they have been applied. I assure you that I did not vote for the Marshall plan because I thought that it would induce the people of Europe to love us. And most assuredly the Russians and their lackeys have been shouting all over Europe about American imperialism and monopolistic capitalism and all the other tired clichés of Soviet propaganda and we have not allowed those cries to dissuade us from our great purpose.

In spite of Secretary Acheson's reported comment of a few weeks ago that the idea of face is a foolish oriental conception, it looks distressingly as though in Asia and indeed in the United States the administration is more interested in saving its face than in saving the peace. Now, of course, the peoples of Asia dislike outside interference and naturally they want to climb up to a place in the sun and we should help them. And since we have no imperialistic intentions or colonial designs, we should, of course, do our best to avoid any appearance that we have. But must we wait until the Communists have fastened their grip on hundreds of millions of people for fear that we may lose face and must we rely on their impotent anger to throw off the foreign yoke? This argument is glib and may at first blush appear deft; but essentially it is a counsel of despair from an administration which, as far as Asia is concerned, appears to be committed to a policy which is based on defeat by default. It is characteristic of the tactics of a counsel for the defense. It has none of the affirmation, none of the dynamism, none of the creativeness which the United States should have at this time of crisis and challenge.

And it is disturbingly reminiscent of one of the arguments advanced against the Marshall plan in 1948, an argument which ran like this: Let us not spend our substance in Europe; if the Russians conquer Europe they will not be able to digest it anyway. The Europeans will revolt and overthrow them. Mr. Speaker, what would we find in Europe if we decided not to protect them from conquest but instead to promise them liberation? What shall we find in Asia if we wait for the effective anger of the Asiatics to "throw off the foreign yoke?" For my part, I am unwilling that American foreign policy in the Far East should rest upon such a slender reed.

Aside from the anger of the unarmed, downtrodden, enslaved Chinese, we are resting our Asiatic policy upon the hope of Titoism. Indeed, these two are related since it is hoped that Chinese anger will precipitate Titoism. Now surely Titoism is highly significant. But in order for any anti-Kremlin movement to gather effective strength we must do more than hope. We must use every possible means, clandestine and otherwise, to create a sturdy irredentism among the people of those provinces which the Soviet Union has dismembered from China and we must endeavor to encourage revolt against the Communists in all parts of China. But in the meantime is it not better to help the 1,000,000 organized anti-Communist guerrillas now on the China mainland and the 300,000 anti-Communist troops on Formosa; is it not better to use the military leadership which remains rather than wait in the hope that Titoism will rise from the ashes of anti-Communist anger? Is it not clear that the anti-Communists are our friends whereas the Tito apostate Communists are merely the potential rivals of the Soviets? Do not the Chinese who are still fighting express the righteous wrath of the freedom-loving Chinese?

Furthermore, since the State Department places such emphasis on the impression which we make in Asia, and the impression is important, let us also remember that we have given an impression of vacillation and indecision toward communism which has done much, if it has not been entirely responsible, for the recognition of the Communist regime in China by a number of countries. For instance, had we indicated our willingness to help the British in the Far East, would the British have granted recognition? And if the British had stood firm would the Indians and the Burmese have recognized the Chinese Communist regime? The attitude of conciliation toward communism which permeates Asia at this time is easily understood when you look at it against the background of defeatism and appeasement which characterizes our posture in the Far East.

Because of the vulnerability of the State Department's position it was apparently also considered clever to resort to derisive and partisan insinuations at a time when a constructive plan and a note of unity were called for. This has taken the form of branding congressional criticism as coming from Republicans who had voted consistently against foreign-affairs legislation. One was given to understand that these Republicans are not interested in China or in America or indeed in world peace but only in partisan advantage. Surely this is the most wicked and effective way to inject partisanship into the issue of life and death which is involved in our foreign affairs.

Now, it so happens that many patriotic Democrats are utterly appalled by what has been happening in the Far East. It is perhaps only human that they should not press the administration too hard. It happens also that it is extremely dangerous business to attempt to assess motives to some of those Republicans who have been attacking the President's China policy. But the fact is that the principal critics in the Republican Party are those very Congressmen and Senators who have been associated with the international view. And the further fact is that a matter of such grave importance should be discussed on its merits and not on any basis of cynical partisan recrimination. Surely it is a good thing that the American people should have the benefit of these criticisms. Certainly the people of America are entitled to a second voice on these vital issues. And assuredly it is our solemn duty to speak our minds, to proclaim our convictions, even though we are thereby exposed to the most expert irony, the most exquisite sarcasm, and the most agile broken field running which the State Department can produce.

Mr. Acheson favored military aid and advice to Greece and Turkey but he does not favor such aid to Formosa. In that connection, he states that he is not shackled by the need for consistency. But aside from this determination to be inconsistent what are some of the reasons given for this difference of policy, for this abandonment of the Truman doctrine?

First it is asserted that Greece is of greater strategic importance than Formosa. Yet the State Department itself in an official bulletin stated in June 1945 "With the exception of Singapore, no location in the Far East occupies such a controlling position * * * Formosa * * * stands in a strategic relation to the China coast comparable for the United States to an island of such size 100 miles off the coast of North Carolina, 400 miles from New York City. Every point on the entire coast of China falls within a radius of 1,100 miles. A radius of 2,000 miles includes Burma, Singapore, Borneo, Guam, and Japan, including Hokkaido." Are we to understand that the strategic importance of Formosa has changed in the past 4½ years or does the desire for inconsistency justify the impromptu accommodation of military strategy to the political exigencies of the moment?

Surely even admitting that Greece is more important strategically, this cannot be the sole basis for a different policy. It is argued that in the Greek war the Communist guerrilla troops retired across the borders of Russian satellite countries from whom they also received aid. But there is no proof that Russia has not aided Mao Tse-tung and certainly the Japanese arms captured by the Russians in Manchuria were used in large quantities to equip the Chinese Reds. Accordingly, this would appear to be a distinction without a difference.

It is contended also that in the case of Greece it was essentially a question of an alien effort at domination. Yet, as I have already stated, Mr. Acheson in his letter of transmittal of the white paper asserts that the war in China is Soviet imperialism masked behind "the facade of a vast crusading movement." It has been asserted that to render aid to Formosa on the Greek pattern will precipitate a war. This argument was also advanced against aid to Greece and in reply the State Department, indeed Mr. Acheson, stated that it was a calculated risk which we should take. In fact, no war has ensued. I suggest to you most forcefully that the abandonment of Formosa increases the danger of eventual war and multiplies the hazards of that war if it should occur. It has been labeled surrender on the installment plan.

But the problem of Formosa, important as it is, is essentially a symbol of the complete and utter failure of our entire far-eastern attitude. Let us not allow the dispute over Formosa to obscure the fact that we have no Asiatic policy worthy of the name and that because of that shocking absence we are being shunted from one disastrous Munich to another. What is needed is an over-all explicit, courageous Asiatic policy. Certainly that policy must be accommodated to the particular problems in each area. Yet today, as far as I can make it out, our policy in Asia consists of the following factors:

First. Point 4 legislation.

Second. Hope for the spread of Titoism.

Third. Reliance on the eventual and effective anger of the Chinese because of the annexation by Russia of Manchuria, Mongolia, and Sinkiang.

Fourth. The determination not to help the forces of freedom because if we did it would "deflect" the anger of the Chinese from the Russians to us.

None of this takes into consideration the open-door policy or the real integrity of China. None of it considers the anger, the indignation, and the frustration of millions of Chinese because we are unwilling to help them in their desire to be free. None of it takes account of the basic human factors involved.

It is a soulless, arid, unimaginative, and defeatist policy. It is unworthy of our traditions and of our present position of responsibility for leadership in a troubled world.

The Secretary of State has been enormously skillful in covering up the persistent ghost of Yalta where, in spite of the Cairo declaration we threw Manchuria to the wolves, where without Chiang Kai-shek's consent we helped to carve up our Chinese friends at the same time as we betrayed our ally Poland. The sad events of today are all part and parcel of this same original sin.

We tried to persuade Chiang to stop fighting the Communists, to make friends with them through a coalition government and then we blame the Chinese because we say that they have no will to fight the Communists. Today, in spite of their demonstrated desire to fight, we refuse them military aid and advice. We criticize Chiang's government for inefficiency and corruption and help to bring on more corruption and a highly efficient despotism. We carp at them for not being sufficiently democratic and help to deprive them of their freedom.

Had China been our enemy she would probably have suffered less than she has by being our friend.

How long shall we allow short-term expediencies to overcome long-term principles? How long shall we continue with the policy of hoping for the best while we fail to prepare for the worst? Where shall we draw the line? Where shall we make a stand? Or are we to sit on the sidelines as derisive spectators and watch the rapid shrinking of the free areas of this planet until finally, friendless and alone, we are routed and overwhelmed in an apocalypse of our own creation?

The resolution of inquiry is as follows:

Whereas Communist ideology and objectives are directed toward the impairment and dissolution of political, economic, and social institutions cherished by the United States of America and the other free peoples of the world, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics has succeeded in imposing communism by coercive measures upon substantial areas of eastern Europe and is engaged in accomplishing similar results by force in territories of the Republic of China; and

Whereas the Government of the United States of America, acting in cooperation with the free peoples of Europe, has taken certain measures to counteract and overcome by peaceful means the expansion of Communist aggression in Europe, but has not met with equal vigor or effect the equal or greater threat to the security of the United States of America and of international peace arising from Communist aggression in Asia; and

Whereas these circumstances are of great and growing concern to this House and to the American people and further information is necessary to enable this House to consider and act upon legislation affecting the foregoing situation:

Resolved, That the State Department be and is requested to furnish this House within 15 days after the adoption of this resolution with full and complete answers to the following questions, namely:

1. Did the Department of State solicit the views of the Secretary of National Defense, of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, and of the Joint Chiefs of Staff regarding the United States policy toward Formosa? If so, were these views presented to the National Security Council?

2. Is the President's January 5, 1950, statement on Formosa in agreement with the views of the Secretary of National Defense, of General MacArthur, and of the Joint Chiefs of Staff?

3. Why did the President make his January 5, 1950, statement on Formosa prior to the return and report of Dr. Philip Jessup?

4. Why did the President make his January 5, 1950, statement on Formosa prior to the report of the Joint Chiefs of Staff following their scheduled survey tour of the Far East in February?

5. Will the Joint Chiefs of Staff visit Formosa on their survey tour?

6. Was it intended to include Hainan in the President's statement on Formosa?

7. If Formosa and Hainan are captured by the Chinese Communists, where and how will the Japanese be able to procure such essential commodities as rice and iron ore to replace those now procured from Formosa and Hainan?

8. Is it likely that the occupation of Japan will cost the American taxpayers an appreciable additional amount if Formosa and Hainan are captured by the Chinese Communists? If so, approximately how much?

9. In his January 5, 1950, statement on Formosa the President states: "The United States Government will not pursue a course which will lead to involvement in the civil conflict in China." Yet the President himself initiated involvement of the United States in the civil conflict in Greece and has repeatedly pledged the assistance of the United States in the cause of the survival of free states against the depredations of aggressive communism. Indeed, in his address to the Congress on March 12, 1947, the President stated: "I believe that it must be the policy of the United States to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by pressures." Why are not the principles of the so-called Truman doctrine applied to Formosa and Hainan as they were applied to Greece and Turkey?

10. If the so-called Truman doctrine is not to be applied to the case of Formosa and Hainan, to what countries in Asia is it to be applied and why?

11. Is it planned to aid the anti-Communists in Indochina with the same pattern of aid as that involved in aid to Greece and Turkey?

12. Is it considered better policy to help later to defend the French and British colonial empires in southeast Asia than to help the people of China now to protect themselves against what the Secretary of State refers to in his letter of transmittal of the white paper as foreign domination?

13. Has the State Department formulated a plan for the protection from Communist aggression of the countries of southeast Asia for which the point 4 program is intended? If not, why not?

14. What is the State Department's estimate of the will to fight of the Chinese anti-Communist forces now based on Formosa as demonstrated in the battle of Kinmen Island in October 1949?

15. What is the State Department's estimate of the land tenure reforms and other measures to improve the welfare of the people of Formosa as carried out by the provisional government of Formosa with the advice and assistance of the Joint Commission for Rural Reconstruction?

16. In his January 5, 1950, statement on Formosa the President refers to the "civil conflict in China." How can this statement be reconciled with the statement by the Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, in his letter of transmittal of the white paper in which he says: "The Communist leaders have foresworn their Chinese heritage and have publicly announced their subservience to a foreign power, Russia, which during the last 50 years, under czars and Communists alike, has been most assiduous in its efforts to extend its control in the Far East. In the recent past, attempts at foreign domination have appeared quite clearly to the Chinese people as external aggression and as such have been bitterly and in the long run successfully resisted. Our aid and encouragement have helped them to resist. In this case, however, the foreign domination has been masked behind the facade of a vast crusading movement which apparently has seemed to many Chinese to be wholly indigenous and national."

17. In his January 5, 1950, statement on Formosa the President states: "It is the view of the United States Government that the resources on Formosa are adequate to enable them to obtain the items which they might consider necessary for the defense of the island." Does this statement mean that we refuse to grant military aid and advice because in the President's judgment they are not necessary? Has the Department of Defense made a recent survey to determine what resources are now available for this purpose? If so, when? If not, when will such a survey be made?

18. Do the "resources" on Formosa referred to in the President's statement include any part of the $75,000,000 which the President was authorized by the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 to spend in the China area? If not, why not?

19. Has the President spent any part of such $75,000,000 for military aid in the general area of China? If not, why not? If so, how much, where and on what items?

20. In his January 5, 1950, statement on Formosa the President states: "The United States Government proposes to continue under existing legislative authority the present ECA program of economic assistance." For what purposes and in what amounts has this assistance been rendered during each quarter of the past calendar year?

21. To what extent has the Economic Cooperation Administration put into operation the $17,000,000 program of capital improvements presented to the Committee on Foreign Affairs in March 1949 during the consideration of the bill to extend the China Aid Act (H. R. 3830)?

22. Is it contemplated to spend in Formosa all the unspent balance of ECA funds for China and for that purpose to request an extension of existing legislative authority which otherwise will expire on February 15, 1950?

23. What are the views of the State Department with regard to the following proposals:

(a) Insist on the terms of the Cairo declaration which provided that Formosa should be returned to the Republic of China;

(b) Consider Formosa as a possession of Japan, despite the Cairo declaration, until final disposition is determined in an eventual Japanese peace settlement;

(c) Conduct a plebescite in Formosa, perhaps under the auspices of the Far Eastern Commission or a special United Nations commission, to determine whether the people desire:

(1) To continue as a province of and the seat of government of the Republic of China;

(2) To be placed under a United Nations trusteeship;

(3) To become an independent nation.

24. The President's Ambassador Extraordinary, Dr. Philip Jessup, declared in Tokyo on the day of the President's January 5, 1950, statement on Formosa that "we have no intention of abandoning China." Does this mean Communist China or does it mean the legal government of China which President Truman's statement on Formosa indicates that we are in effect abandoning?

25. Does the State Department contend that the United States has encouraged and is encouraging "all developments in China which now and in the future work toward" the end of throwing "off the foreign yoke"? (The words in quotation marks are from Mr. Dean Acheson's letter of transmittal of the white paper.) Does the State Department feel that the President's January 5, 1950, statement on Formosa and Mr. Acheson's recent declaration will work toward that end?

26. Has the State Department any information that, while the United States refuses aid to the Chinese anti-Communists, the Russians are delivering amphibious assault equipment to the Chinese Communists and in particular from Vladivostok?

27. What is the State Department's position with respect to the recognition of the Communist regime in China by the British Government and the automatic rupture of relations with the duly constituted Government of China which such recognition entails?

28. Is it the view of the State Department that an essential criterion for the recognition of a government is the free approval of that government by a majority of its citizens and that there must be incontrovertible evidence of such approval before recognition is granted?

29. Will the State Department through its delegates to the United Nations oppose the admission of the Communist regime in China as a member of the United Nations? If not, why not?

30. On December 3, 1949, the General Assembly of the United Nations voted to refer the Chinese complaint against the Soviet Union to the Little Assembly for study and report to the next session of the General Assembly next November. Prior to such study several members of the United Nations have withdrawn recognition of the Republic of China, and some now propose to expel her from the United Nations. Is it the view of the State Department that this procedure will be a useful precedent in connection with any future complaints against the Soviet Union?

31. In the Sino-American agreement of December 8, 1947, the United States was to transfer to China naval vessels and craft "not to exceed 271 in number."

(a) How many naval vessels and craft have been transferred under this agreement?

(b) What was the condition of the naval vessels and craft so transferred?

(c) Why have not 271 naval vessels and craft been transferred?

(d) When is it expected that the balance of the 271 naval vessels and craft will be transferred?

32. When, in the opinion of the State Department, did it become too late to aid the anti-Communists in China?

COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. DELANEY, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 437, Rept. No. 1514), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6616) to provide for the expeditious naturalization of former citizens of the United States who have lost United States citizenship through voting in a political election or in a plebiscite held in Italy. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight tonight to file a report on House Joint Resolution 371, the insurance bill, and that the minority members of the Committee on Ways and Means may have the same time in which to file a minority report.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the understanding is, of course, that that applies to me; that I may have the right to file a minority report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I wonder if the majority leader could tell us when it is contemplated that the measure might be considered on the floor?

Mr. McCORMACK. I announced last week that if House Joint Resolution 371 is reported and a rule is granted, that notice of consideration would be given as soon as possible. I would like to bring it up Thursday, to be perfectly frank, if that can be done.

Mr. HALLECK. I wonder if it is going to be necessary to get a rule on the measure.

Mr. McCORMACK. I wish I could answer my friend now, but I am unable to.

Mr. HALLECK. Of course, if it required a rule and the Committee on Rules met tomorrow and filed a rule tomorrow, it could come up on Thursday. However, I guess it is not material at this point, except as it might give some further light as to whether or not it would come up.

Mr. McCORMACK. I wish I were in a position where I could advise the House, and my friend who made the inquiry, but I am not now.

Mr. HALLECK. I wonder if the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means could give us any light on that. If I might speak to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, I was inquiring whether or not the bill was such that the Committee on Ways and Means would request a rule on the measure, or whether it will be brought up without a rule.

Mr. DOUGHTON. We will determine that sometime today.

Mr. HALLECK. Then that will be determined during the day?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. That was my understanding. That is why I could not give a definite answer to the inquiry made of me.

Mr. HALLECK. As I understand the previous statement of the majority leader as to the program for the balance of the week, this is the only measure that is in contemplation for the balance of the week.

Mr. McCORMACK. I would rather not be held strictly to that just now.

Mr. HALLECK. Very well.

Mr. McCORMACK. I might say that that is the probable situation, but I will announce that tomorrow or Thursday. There have been four rules reported out by the Committee on Rules to date, and I am going to examine them this afternoon. I do not see any one of them that requires consideration this week, but I would not want to make a definite answer which would definitely commit me because, as you know, if I make a definite answer, I will keep my word.

Mr. HALLECK. I appreciate that, and I can understand the situation that confronts us. I have had special inquiry regarding the cotton-quota bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is the one possibility. I understand the Committee on Rules is meeting again Thursday on that, and that is the reason I am unable to give a definite answer now because of that particular bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JUDD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include extraneous material.

Mr. KLEIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. BARING (at the request of Mr. MULTER) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RODINO (at the request of Mr. MULTER) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE JEWS IN SPAIN

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this time to tell the House about the Jews in Spain.

This is not a plea for resumption of diplomatic relations with Spain. Whatever our course of conduct with any country, it should be based upon principle and upon truth.

I love freedom and democracy. I will never embrace any form of totalitarianism. I therefore despise every type of dictatorship, political or religious, vicious or benevolent. But the type of government of any nation is not to be decided by outside sources. One of the fundamental features of the United Nations Charter is the right of each country to determine for itself how it shall be governed. My thoughts and feelings on this subject have been openly and freely declared and publicized.

Accordingly, I had never had any desire to visit Spain. In fact, I felt that my vigorous, if not violent, denunciation of Franco would, to say the least, make me unwelcome there. More than a year ago I had been told that my antagonism against the Spanish Government was engendered by misinformation and that the Jew in Spain was accorded the same privileges as any other Spaniard. I made no effort to hide my disbelief. In fact I said that if that were true, the Jews would be the first to proclaim it. Why not, said I, have one or more of the leaders of Spanish Jewry come to the United States and tell it to us. The response was that such procedure would be derided in the American press as paid propaganda.

I continued to believe the newspaper and magazine articles about the terribly oppressive conditions under which Jews lived in Spain, confined in ghettos, denied the right of religious worship and the pursuit of the traditional rites of practicing Jews.

When my wife and I planned a trip to the European Continent and the Middle East last year, Spain was not on our itinerary. It was not even once considered as a place we cared to see. My mind was closed on Spain and on the possibility of any good coming out of it. Incidentally, even though I planned and did devote much time on that trip to matters of official interest to me as a Member of Congress, I bore the full expense thereof personally.

On the start of our journey, aboard the Queen Mary, I heard much talk from apparently responsible sources directly at variance with my beliefs about Spain. In London and Paris I heard more of the same tenor. I continued to hold to my own ideas on the subject.

In Paris we attended the Rosh Hashana—Jewish New Year—services in the famous Rothschild Synagogue. It overflowed with worshipers. There was standing room only. During the portion of the services devoted to meditation I thought of the fact that here were thousands of free men and women praying according to their ancient tradition in a place but so recently occupied by Hitler's Nazis. Through my mind ran the places where freedom of worship was still proscribed. Communist Russia and her satellites came to mind, some Arab countries, and then Spain. An inspiration struck me. At least some of my colleagues were going to Spain and might be misled by false propaganda into bringing tales to the United States that all was well there with the Jew. I could scotch such tales if I could go there and bring home first-hand knowledge of the true situation.

Fearful that my request for a visa would be denied, I did not present myself at the Spanish Embassy in Paris. Instead I asked the American Embassy in Paris to obtain our Spanish visas. In due course our passports came back with the visas affixed.

From France we proceeded to Spain instead of going to Italy as originally planned. Obviously, I had no interest in Generalissimo Franco. I had no desire to see him and I did not see him.

We spent most of our time with the members of the Jewish communities. We conversed in English, Yiddish, and German. We were in their places of business, in their homes, and in their synagogues. We were shown around Barcelona by native Jews who were as proud of their city as any Brooklynite is of his Brooklyn—than whom there is no prouder native son. I know it will sound incredible to the average American but here is the truth and I will document it for you.

There is no discrimination against the Jew in business or in employment in Spain. The Jewish employee and the Jewish employer have the same privileges and the same rights as any Spaniard. No one asks him his religion. It is the only place in the Eastern Hemisphere, outside of Israel, where I observed Jews proudly wearing in their lapels the gold Mogen Dovid, the shield of David, colloquially referred to as the Jewish star. The Jews are engaged in business as merchants, exporters, importers, and manufacturers.

They live wherever they can afford to rent or buy a home. There is no ghetto. No one asks their religion before they rent or sell a home to a Jew.

They make no attempt to hide their Judaism. They are not afraid of persecution because they happen to be Jews.

I had been told that they were not permitted to acquire Torahs—Holy Bibles, handwritten in Hebrew upon parchment scrolls. Here is a photostatic copy of an original certificate by the Spanish authorities permitting Mr. D. Salomon Romano, as secretary of the Jewish community of Barcelona, to import a Torah, free of duty or other payment.

Shortly after our arrival in Barcelona the local Jewish community tendered a testimonial dinner to me at the Ritz Hotel. Not only was the dinner publicized but the printed menu cards—I hold an autographed copy of one in my hand—said in Spanish that it was tendered by the Jewish community of Barcelona. The place cards carried the names of every person in attendance. Pictures were taken by a commercial photographer. I have several of them here. That is certainly not the conduct of a minority group of people which is faced with persecution or is fearful of oppression.

Congressman EUGENE J. KEOGH, of New York, made an inspiring talk at this dinner, which was gratefully acknowledged by those in attendance. I visited their synagogue which is used for daily prayer. Here are the photographs of the interior of that synagogue. One of these shows the rabbi in the pulpit. I worshiped with them at their Sabbath services.

Any Christian entering that place of worship will see at a glance that it is not a Catholic church. Any Jew will observe at once that it is a synagogue.

As in most Jewish communities, the synagogue customarily used for daily prayer is not large enough to accommodate the large number of worshipers on the high holy days. In Barcelona, they solved their high holy day problem by renting a theater which they equipped for use as a synagogue during those holidays. I was there between New Year's Day—Rosh Hashanah—and the Day of Atonement—Yom Kippur. Here are the pictures of the interior of that building as it was prepared for use as a synagogue. Note please that the names of the pew holders appear on every seat.

It was in Barcelona that I first learned of the thousands of Jews that were rescued with the aid of Spain from the Nazis. That was told to me by a Jew who had been interned in a concentration camp and who was not only rescued by Franco's men but was given the very job he holds today by one of them.

I later had the fact confirmed to me by a representative of the American Joint Distribution Committee that during the height of Hitler's blood baths, upward of 60,000 Jews had been saved through the generosity of Spanish authorities who permitted them to enter into Spain and then helped them proceed to places of safe refuge.

Upon my return to this country I contacted the World Jewish Congress and received from its representative a copy of the resolution it adopted in November 1944 in Atlantic City, N. J. Let me quote this sentence to you from that resolution:

> The War Emergency Conference extends its gratitude to the Holy See and to the Governments of Sweden, Switzerland, and Spain and to the International Committee of the Red Cross for the protection they offered under difficult conditions to the persecuted Jews in Hungary. It is confident that this protection will be continued and its scope enlarged in accordance with the contingency of the situation.

From Barcelona we flew to Madrid. Again we devoted ourselves to the Jewish community. There are only about 500 Jews in Madrid and about 3,500 in Barcelona. I since learned that there are also two very small communities in Valencia and Seville. The total population of Spain is 28,000,000 of whom between 4,000 and 5,000 are Jews.

In Madrid we attended the Yom Kippur services in their synagogue. I participated in the prayer services, wherein we used Torahs which in 1939 had been secreted for safekeeping in a Catholic monastery and later returned by a Catholic bishop to Dr. Ignacio Bauer, as president of the Jewish community in Madrid. Dr. Bauer is a lawyer and a professor of law at the University of Madrid. A teacher of English in a Catholic high school there assured us that the school authorities have known from the day they hired her that she was an orthodox Jewess.

I inquired in both cities about restrictions against the practice of traditional Jewish rites. I was assured that there was no restriction against kosher slaughtering of fowl and cattle.

The Jews are required to obtain permits to maintain their synagogues. The same is true, however, of all non-Catholic places of worship. Having in mind that Spain, like certain other European countries, has a state religion, I thought this was an unfair requirement imposed for the benefit of the Catholic Church. England and the Scandinavian countries have state religions, but no such requirement.

Italy, which has no state religion, does have such a requirement. The reason given for the requirement in Spain and in Italy was that the government desired to be in a position of assuring itself that no religious institution would be used as a cover for revolutionary or antigovernment activity.

While understanding the reason I do not approve the regulation. I think both Italy and Spain stand to gain more in the eyes of the free world by abolishing such regulations.

What bothered me greatly, however, was the fact that although both the Barcelona and the Madrid Jewish communities had been assured by authorities that their applications for permits were in order and that they could function, no written permits had been issued by the authorities. I also learned that in Barcelona the Jews were not permitted to bury their dead, but were required to seal the bodies in vaults in a wall maintained at one side of the civil cemetery. This condition did not prevail in Madrid, where the civil cemetery was divided by a wall into what became two cemeteries, one for the Jews and the other for the Protestants.

I was assured by Mr. Enrique Benarroya, president of the Jewish Community in Barcelona, and by Dr. Ignacio Bauer, president of the Jewish Community in Madrid, as well as by many others in both cities, that they were quite happy with their lot in life, that the Spanish authorities extended every cooperation to them and their co-religionists, and that they suffered no discrimination at the hands of the authorities or of private citizens.

Before leaving Madrid I called on the Foreign Minister. I told him of the things I had learned about the Jews in Barcelona and Madrid. I told him how very glad I was about some of the things I had learned. I also told him about the things I did not like.

I emphasized particularly that, while I did not approve of the regulations requiring permits to maintain places of worship, at least the written permits should be issued if governmental requirements were met. I also said that the cemetery situation was not only intolerable but irreligious.

I was most agreeably surprised to find that the Foreign Minister was in accord with my thinking on both subjects. While he knew that both Jewish communities were maintaining synagogues, he professed not to know that written permits had not been issued by the local authorities. He assured me he would inquire into the matter and see that they were promptly issued. He was disturbed to learn about the cemetery situation, and promised me that if my facts were correct those regulations would be rescinded at once.

After discussing these matters with my distinguished colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEOGH], he suggested that we discuss them with the Spanish Ambassador at Large, Jose F. de Lequerica. Upon our return to Washington, D. C., we did just that, and the Ambassador offered to follow the matter with his Government to a satisfactory conclusion.

I am happy to announce today that I have before me confirmation of the fact that formal permits have been issued by the proper Spanish authorities for the maintenance of the Jewish synagogues, and for the burial of Jewish dead in accordance with orthodox religious requirements.

This confirmation comes to me from many sources. Ambassador de Lequerica has so advised me orally and in writing. An American friend in Spain who has nothing to fear from any source has so advised me in writing. The World Jewish Congress and the American Joint Distribution Committee have likewise confirmed those facts.

The World Jewish Congress wrote me:

We received direct confirmation from our friends in Spain that the Barcelona community was granted official recognition, and that the communities of Barcelona and Seville were given permission to maintain their cemetery.

Dr. Bauer wrote me from Madrid:

I am certain you are already aware of your great personal success. Thanks to your intervention, the Barcelona community is already officially recognized, and we hope that the Madrid community will also be approved shortly. I consider this as being really a great feat.

The American Joint Distribution Committee wrote me under date of January 12, 1950:

The efforts you made while in Madrid apparently have borne early and productive fruit.

Mr. Benarroya wrote me from Barcelona as follows:

Since your visit things have been happening very fast and in our favor. On the part of the civil governor and in accordance with instructions from Madrid, we have obtained official recognition for our community, which puts us in the same situation as all other communities in other countries. We are under the impression that this was due to the influence of the United States of America, and knowing that you dear Mr. MULTER had something to do with this, we send you our thanks, and ask that you send same along to the other people who intervened.

I take this occasion to extend such thanks publicly to all those who lent their good offices to the excellent results obtained and especial thanks to my good friend and distinguished colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEOGH].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BONNER). The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER] has expired.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, permit me to commend my distinguished colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER] for his typically intelligent address. He has been overly generous in his treatment of me for which, of course, I am grateful. My knowledge of the matters about which he has spoken leads me to observe that he has rendered our country a great and courageous service, in addition to which he has been an important factor in further removing some of the real or fancied differences that have tended to separate us from the people of Spain—a separation which, if removed ,would better serve the interests of all peaceful and freedom-loving people. You have listened to a well-documented report from one of our most energetic and capable Members from New York. The long-time effect of his conscientious and successful efforts to improve the situation of the Jews in Spain will become the greater as time goes on. He has well served the cause of peace and has well served the Spaniards of Jewish faith.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MONRONEY (at the request of Mr. PRIEST) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances, and in one to include a letter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] is recognized for 20 minutes.

THE COAL SITUATION

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include a resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, must every coal bin in every American home be absolutely empty, every school closed and every hospital on rationed heat and light—must every power plant be shut down, whole cities in darkness and every major manufacturing plant unable to operate—must our whole economy be at a standstill and there be wholesale unemployment—must our people actually starve and freeze—must all these things come to pass before the President of the United States is willing to recognize that the national health and safety are being imperiled by the current coal shortage resulting from the current strike?

How long does the President intend to play this shameful game of politics, with helpless American people as mere pawns? Must the welfare of all the people be sacrificed in order that the selfish ends of a few arrogant labor union leaders may be served by a subservient administration?

Mr. Speaker, these are questions which are being asked by the people we represent as they find themselves on a rationed coal supply, having to pay black-market prices for whatever coal may be available, and having to burn wood to secure heat enough to survive. Those are questions being asked by an ever-increasing number who are filling the ranks of the unemployed, as the coal supply diminishes and manufacturing operations are curtailed.

On three previous occasions I have addressed this House to call attention to the acute coal shortage resulting from the current strike. Last September, and again on January 12 of this year, I introduced a resolution calling upon the President to invoke the national-emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. Several Members have addressed this House on this matter, and around 24 such resolutions have been introduced. Several Senators have sponsored a like resolution in the other body.

But notwithstanding all such efforts calling the attention of President Truman to the critical coal situation in the country, with innocent people and whole communities enduring great hardship and suffering, he stubbornly refuses to exercise the authority vested in him under existing law to meet just such an emergency as this. He has persisted in saying that no emergency exists. But, as I stated in my letter to the Chairman of the House Committee on Education and Labor, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LESINSKI], if he would grant us a hearing we would present to his committee persuasive and compelling evidence that this coal strike imperils our national health and safety.

During this past week end, Mr. Speaker, I visited my home State of Illinois. I canvassed the coal situation myself. The Illinois Fuel Merchants Association also conducted a comprehensive canvas of the entire State. I hold in my hand the reports up to date received from the various cities, towns and villages. I have here in my hand, first-hand conclusive evidence of the exact situation.

The reports I have here are not estimates of last month's coal supply prepared by some long-haired Department of Interior statistician to support a preconceived political conclusion of an administration that hired him and can fire him. The reports I have here are the hard, cold, bitter, distressing facts of the actual situation.

The J. H. Catlow Coal Co., of Barrington, Ill., which is in my district, wired me as follows:

Coal situation serious Barrington. Rest home, 52 patients, now burning wood. Many homes have only a few days' supply.

A careful check was made of the situation in Barrington, which is a community of around 4,800 people. The coal supply in that little community has been so low that for the past 3 months the dealers have been obliged to ration their limited supply. They have been able to obtain some coal only by paying black market prices of $4 and up per ton more than the normal consumer price.

The rest home, referred to in the telegram, is an institution with 52 aged inmates. What coal it has on hand, with no coal in transit and no immediate prospects of obtaining any, is being used to bank the fire at nights. In the daytime they burn wood.

If there should be a severe cold spell, this whole community will almost overnight be completely without any coal whatever. And there are other communities in the same trying predicament. But, apparently, in the eyes of the President there can be no emergency until every lump of coal above the ground has been burned.

Speaking of having to burn wood in order to get heat, I have here a clipping from a newspaper in St. Charles, Ill., which is ably represented by my good friend and colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REED]. It states that with only 90 tons of coal on hand for a normal weekly consumption of 800 tons, the city has invited the people to use the woodpile accumulated by the city in its tree-removal program in which about 1,000 trees were cut down.

Of course, people are not going to freeze so long as they can find something to burn. It sounds ridiculous, and it would be; but I would not be at all surprised if the Department of Agriculture released some figures within the next few days to show that there is an abundance of wood available for home-heating purposes to support the administration's absurd contention that there is no emergency in the coal industry.

Mr. Speaker, let me call attention to one or two other items in this careful survey of the coal situation in Illinois. No one can look at these first-hand reports without being startled at the number of communities that are on a day-by-day existence in their coal supply.

In Gurnee, Ill., for example, which is a community of about 1,800 people, there is only tonnage available for 1 day. This community is able to meet its barest needs only by obtaining from a neighboring city of Waukegan coal in 1-ton lots to meet emergency needs. A few days of severe cold weather, and the people of Gurnee will be completely helpless.

The same situation exists in Normal, Ill., which has a population of around 8,500. The Illinois Soldiers and Sailors home, located there, the Illinois State Normal, and the schools have on hand only enough coal to last 24 hours.

In Rockford, Ill., the St. Anthony Hospital has only 1 day's supply. At the very best the city has on hand only 3 days' supply for all its needs, and it is able to get along in this relatively mild weather only by purchasing coal at black-market prices of from $2 to $3 a ton more than the normal price.

The reports I have here show that the city of Elgin, Ill., of around 45,000 people, has on hand only a little over 2 days' supply. The two hospitals in the city have less than 2 days' supply, and the industries there are facing sharp curtailment in their operations as their coal supply continues to diminish.

And so on through this pile of reports, there is this showing of large black-market operations, churches, schools, and hospitals with hardly any coal, and people having to find other means of heating their homes.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the record at this point a resolution adopted by the village of Libertyville, Ill., on January 17.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Whereas more than 60 percent of the homes within the corporate limits of the village of Libertyville, Ill., are dependent upon coal for heating purposes and, with the large increase in population which has taken place in the village since the last Federal census, the population of this village is now in excess of 6,000 persons; and

Whereas all the schools, the main water plant, and the sanitary sewerage plant in this municipality are dependent upon coal for heating purposes; and

Whereas the vast majority of the business buildings and industries of this village are dependent upon coal for heating and operation purposes; and

Whereas a large area surrounding the village is dependent upon the coal distributors of this village for coal for heating and other purposes; and

Whereas a thorough survey of the existing coal stocks in this village discloses that said stocks will be exhausted on or about January 27, 1950, that no coal supplies are in transit to supply the needs of the village and that there exists at present no promise of any future delivery of coal to the village; and

Whereas there is now imminent danger of large numbers of homes in the village being without heat during the heart of the present winter, in probable subzero weather, of the schools being closed and of businesses and industries being shut down; and

Whereas the health of our people and the safety of the community are now in great jeopardy: Now, therefore, be it and it is hereby

Resolved by the president and board of trustees of the village of Libertyville, Ill., That a serious emergency exists in this municipality by reason of the depleted coal supplies of the village and the present dark outlook with reference to obtaining adequate additional supplies, all occasioned by coal strikes and related causes limiting coal supplies at the source on a national scale; and be it further

Resolved, That Federal and State authorities be and they are hereby memorialized to take prompt action to cope with the present emergency; and be it further

Resolved, That the village clerk be and he is hereby directed to forward copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, each of the United States Senators from Illinois, the Congressman from this district, the Governor of Illinois, the Illinois Municipal League, and the public press.

Passed January 17, 1950.

Approved January 17, 1950.

J. J. JAEGER,
President.

Attest:

C. O. CARLSON,
Village Clerk.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to represent the more than 6,000 people who live in Libertyville, and it is my duty to them, as well as to all the people, to try to secure prompt action in the emergency situation that presently confronts us.

As I stated at the outset, the coal shortage is so acute that industries are beginning to curtail operations and unemployment is increasing. Last Friday the Inland Steel Co. announced that it had been compelled to shut down its blast furnace at the Indiana Harbor plant because of the shortage of coking coal. As this blast furnace produced iron for foundries and for steel manufacturing, the stoppage of its operations will have its adverse effect on other industries.

And other steel companies, such as the Republic Steel Co. and the Carnegie-Illinois Steel Works in Gary, Ind., and South Chicago are carefully surveying their low coal supplies, with the possibility of a cut-back in their operations.

All this President Truman ignores. And you will recall that he told us in one of his messages that steel production was so important to our national economy that unless there was an increase the Government itself should go into the steel business.

If there is no national emergency in the coal situation, why was it necessary for the Interstate Commerce Commission to issue on December 23, 1949, what is known as Service Order 844, which provides priority in coal for locomotive consumption where the supply on hand is less than 9 days? Why was it necessary for the Commission to issue Service Order 845 on January 8 of this year by which passenger service was curtailed by 33⅓ percent on coal-consuming runs?

Mr. Speaker, I should like to read to the House the following telegram dated January 20 which I received from Mr. W. A. Johnston, president of the Illinois Central Railroad:

The fact that the United Mine Worker mines in our territory are only working 3 days a week, and being subject to wildcat strikes on the permissive days, is creating a very acute coal shortage all over our territory and we on the Illinois Central are having extreme difficulty securing from our operators sufficient coal to keep our road in operation. We are down today to about 5 days total supply in cars, in chutes, and on the ground and have been for weeks living from hand to mouth.

Should there be a cold snap we would very likely have to retard our freight-train operation and there would be extreme suffering because of lack of coal in retail yards. Cannot something be done by the Government to overcome this predicament?

In order that we, as representatives of the people, might somehow impress upon the President the seriousness of the situation confronting our people, I introduced the resolution calling upon him to invoke the Taft-Hartley Act. By asking him to invoke the national emergency provisions of that act we are not asking him to have the Attorney General obtain a court injunction. We are asking him to take the initial step provided by the Taft-Hartley Act, and that is to set up a board of inquiry to ascertain the facts in the coal dispute and the issues involved.

It seems strange indeed that the President is not even willing to have such a board inquire into the existing coal situation. There is nothing in the act which requires that the President take any action on the board's findings. The board does not even make recommendations. In fact, the act specifically states that its report on the facts shall not contain any recommendations.

Why, then, does President Truman refuse to establish such a board? Is it that he is afraid of the truth? The Taft-Hartley Act provides that the board's report shall be made public. Is it that the President is afraid that the board's report will publicly show such a shockingly critical situation resulting from the coal strike that he will find it politically impossible to continue to play politics at the expense of the American people for the benefit of a few?

The responsibility for this very serious condition in the United States, with whole communities without sufficient fuel and the prospects of a complete break-down of our whole economy, rests squarely on the shoulders of President Truman.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. DONDERO. In conjunction with what the gentleman from Illinois has said, I hold in my hand a part of the front page of the Pontiac Daily Press, published in a city of 80,000 people. The headline is, "Coal piles dwindle in cities and States." The subheadline is to the effect that they have between 5 and 7 days' coal supply left in my State of Michigan.

Mr. CHURCH. I want to thank the gentleman for his additional evidence. If the Members will read Senator CAIN'S speech of yesterday in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD they will find three pages of additional evidence there, especially with reference to his State of Washington.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I want to compliment the gentleman on the statements he has made with reference to this situation. His district borders mine. The statement he has made with reference to the shortage of coal and its effect upon unemployment is absolutely true.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. DONDERO. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. May I say that the mayor of my home city has sent me a wire saying that they have 2 days' supply left in Royal Oak, Mich.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Does not the gentleman think that if some of these wires were sent to the coal operators and the mine owners, where the responsibility actually rests, you might get better results? What we are doing here is placing the blame on the miners, on the workers, when the blame rests squarely on the shoulders of the mine operators and the mine owners, who will not concede to these men that which rightfully belongs to them.

Mr. CHURCH. But the strikers are demanding concessions specifically prohibited by law. At any rate, what objection can there possibly be to having a board of inquiry ascertain the facts in the dispute and the matters in issue?

May I say to the gentleman that if the President of the United States would follow the law of the land and encourage respect for the law, we would not have such headlines that appear in today's Times-Herald, "Union Tells Strike Plan to Jam Phones"; "Workers Told to Overload Dial System"; "CWA Boss Asks for CIO Support." Here is a proposal to make it impossible for dial phones to be used. Here is a proposal to disregard the rights of others.

Let me say further to the gentleman from New York that I believe he should encourage the President of the United States to follow the law and the moral principle that the industry and the workers must have respect for the law of the land, even though they may not like the particular law in question. The workers have their rights and the operators have their rights, but the paramount right is that of the general public. It is this paramount right that we are asking the President to recognize.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. PATMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 30 minutes on Monday and on Tuesday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of those days and following any special orders heretofore entered.

FOREIGN SKILLED PERSONNEL ADMISSION BILL

Mr. MADDEN, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 438, Rept. No. 1519), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3001) to authorize the admission into the United States of certain aliens possessing special skills. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] is recognized for 30 minutes.

FALLACIES OF WORLD FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the issue of world government has been placed before the House by a set of concurrent resolutions, all of similar language, seeking to put this House and this Congress on record as stating the project of world government to be an aim of United States foreign policy. These resolutions have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which has made them the subject of hearings. The Committee has not yet acted on them.

The implications of the proposal are so vast, however, as to merit the attention of every Member of this House. It is my purpose to discuss these implications as I see them.

The proposition contained in these resolutions sounds very persuasive as long as it is considered on the level of abstractions. No one can take issue with the idea of adequate safeguards for peace. No one can object to the ideal of justice under law throughout the world. No one can grapple with purely imaginary concepts such as a world sovereign or a world federation.

It is only when one gets down to cases and attempts to see the proposition in concrete application that one comes to question whether the proposition is a sound one.

This Congress should not put forth this proposition if it is an unsound one. After careful consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the proposition is not sound but fallacious.

Even if the proposition were sound, a concurrent resolution would be an entirely inappropriate way of proclaiming it to the world. It would not be effective. It would not be convincing. It would be legally questionable. The only proper course would be that of a constitutional amendment.

I shall discuss, therefore, the fundamental fallacies of the proposition for a world state, the inappropriateness of a concurrent resolution as a means of registering the national will on the proposed world state and the idea of a constitutional amendment as the only proper procedure.

Let us see precisely what is proposed before we develop the fallacies.

The resolutions state that it is the sense of the Congress that it shall be the policy of the United States to strengthen the United Nations to the end that it shall become a world government having the attributes of making, interpreting, and enforcing law on a world scale.

On a proposition of such importance it behooves the Congress to withhold an expression of approval unless and until the support of the American people has been amply demonstrated. It would be a reckless imposture for the Congress to announce an intention of such world-wide and historic significance if the American people had not first resolved their will to support and carry through a design for world government. Such an expression by the Congress would be a gesture of misrepresentation. It would be the very negation of the Congress' function and duty of representing the people of the United States.

No evidence at hand indicates that the American people support this proposition. Proponents of the resolution have cited the results of public-opinion polls, expressions of view by several of the State legislatures, and the like to support the assertion of public approval. Such generalized expressions of sentiment and mood are inadequate as evidence of a considered judgment and a sustained will to submit to a world state. It is not enough to assert that such judgment and will exist. It would be necessary to prove their existence before the Congress would be entitled to announce to the world a statement of policy premised upon their existence.

The lack of proof of public support for this proposition is easy to demonstrate.

First of all, this is a proposition to destroy the United Nations.

That is not what the resolutions say in so many words. They use the word "strengthen" rather than the word "destroy." An analysis will show very readily, however, that it is not the strengthening of the United Nations which these resolutions propose. The United Nations—the organization that now exists—does not have the attributes that this proposed world government would have. The attributes of the United Nations are those set forth in its Charter. The Charter is in principle entirely different from the charter that the international state proposed in these resolutions. The attributes being different, then the things themselves would be different. Only the names might be the same. Let us not be deceived by names. To be accurate, to avoid deception, these resolutions should not talk of strengthening the United Nations. They should talk of discarding the United Nations and setting up something entirely different in its place. The mere rhetorical use of the same name should not be permitted to obscure the fact that this is a proposal to jettison the United Nations as it now exists.

Nothing adduced in the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Affairs or elsewhere indicates that the American people wish to discard the United Nations. Nothing has been shown to indicate that they now wish to turn their backs on that experiment, after some 4 years of trial, and take off on a fanciful flight into the hypotheses of world government.

Second, this is a proposition to supersede and extinguish the Constitution of the United States.

Again, the resolutions do not say so in precise words. The conclusion is inevitable, however, if one looks analytically at what they do say.

World government—a world federal state going by the name of the United Nations or any other name—would necessarily have the attributes of government. The resolutions do not conceal this. They speak of a world government capable of making, interpreting, and enforcing world law.

Before examining all the implications of this, it is well to allude to the argument, as put forth by the proponents, that the world government would necessarily be limited. This formula for limited unlimited government, for a state which is universal in particulars, is somewhat vague. It is difficult to find substantial meaning in the assurances, as given in testimony, that the world government will be primarily to prevent violence and enforce peace in the world and to run a world police force capable of enforcing the world will on any member—just that and nothing more.

All of us should have realized by now that war has become totalitarian not only in its impact but in its roots. Any social stress, any friction or sag in the economy, or any frustration of a people's aims is potentially a factor in disrupting the peace of the world. A world government with power to take jurisdiction over all matters that bear on war and peace would be capable of taking jurisdiction over everything.

We are reminded by the proponents, however, of the experience of our own Government. The Thirteen Original States were not completely supplanted by the Federal Government. The American experience, the proponents assert, demonstrates that a government can be both central and universal on the one hand and limited on the other.

The rejoinder is that the American experience does not lend an appropriate comparison. The men of the Thirteen Original States had not only language in common; they were versed in Blackstone, Coke, and John Locke. They had a common concept of public law. The concept of limitation of power and of constitutional right was inherent in their thought and action. Upon the basis of this community of precept and understanding they were able to form a national Government of limited powers and constitutional principles.

The world with which we are now invited to amalgamate, in whose great central sovereign we are now invited to submerge our rights, presents no such general concept of limited government. We might as well admit that, with all our enshrinement of democratic principles, absolutism and capricious use of power now characterize government over the larger part of the world's peoples. Nothing could be more misleading than the expectation that a world government would necessarily emerge in the pattern of the American Constitution—that somehow the principles of the American experience would be engrafted upon a world state formed largely of peoples who are unfamiliar with, and perhaps even inherently hostile toward, the sort of principles that we live by in the United States.

This line of argument, however, is not a determining one. Let us assume for argument that a world government would emerge in line with the principles upon which our own Government rests. Let us evaluate the case on that premise.

Such a government would be clothed with sovereign powers similar to those of the United States. It would have the power to tax and to appropriate. It would have power to raise and support its own armed forces, and would have authority to use them wherever in its sovereign wisdom it might choose. It would have the power to coin money and determine the value thereof. It would control commerce throughout the world. It would be empowered to take over and use property for its own purposes. It would have a universal claim upon allegiance and in return would have the obligation to give protection universally throughout its domain. It would have the power to enforce its own law throughout its entire area.

Let us look at the question of vesting the proposed world state with power to tax and appropriate.

Are the American people ready to yield up to an hypothetical world legislature the power to levy world taxes against their property, transactions, and incomes? Are they ready to permit the world legislature to determine where and how the wealth exacted from them by world taxation shall be spent? It may be that they are. Perhaps it is their sentiment that such power over American wealth and American destiny should be surrendered to a sovereign body in which America would have a small voice, a very small voice indeed. Nothing in the hearings shows this, however, and in the absence of clear proof it would ill become the Congress to proclaim a proposition premised on the supposition that the American people are ready and willing for such an undertaking.

Let us look next at the implications of the military powers of the envisaged world government.

Is this Congress really willing to give up its constitutional prerogative in matters of declaring war and exercising control over the armed forces? Do the American people wish such a course? Nothing adduced in the hearings supports an affirmative answer.

It is easy and beguiling to imagine, as the proponents of world federation do, a world government in which all the military resources of all the peoples would be pooled in something called an international police force. Some rather like to imagine a dedicated army of idealistic youths marshaled by some mythical Eisenhower and working under the peace plans of some enlightened world general staff. Somehow the idea seems to escape them that the world army might be a ruthless army, that its commanders might be men of overweening ambition, and that its world general staff might have in its hands power vastly in excess of its sense of responsibility.

How many world army divisions of Communist troops would we want to have garrisoned in the United States? How much control over American resources in men and armament would we want to yield to a world government and its general staff, on which American representation would constitute only a small minority? We had better ask the questions now. After the world federal constitution should have taken effect it would be too late. The power to determine the answers would have passed from America's hands; the world government would be making the decisions.

One should not overlook that such a world government would necessarily have power to levy forces. That would entail the power to conscript. That would mean the conscription of Americans for military service in such number, in accordance with such standards, and for service in such parts of the world as the world authority might decide. Americans have adopted conscription as a basis for raising their own armed forces only in times of great emergency and with great reluctance. That they are now willing to yield such power over American lives to a world authority in which this country would have a minority voice is, to say the least, open to serious question.

Let us look next at the implications of yielding to a world government power to coin money and regulate the value thereof.

Do the American people wish to do away with the dollar—to have it absorbed in, and supplanted by, some new world currency?

Let us assume that the unit of the new world currency will be called the global. How many globals will a dollar be worth when the great transition is made? How many francs will be counted equivalent to a global? How many pesetas? How many rubles? The world legislature can decided all that. The great world-wide share-the-wealth plan can be put through as one of the first acts of the new world legislature.

Maybe the American people are ready for that. But if so, there is nothing in the hearings to show it.

Let us consider next the control of commerce.

This is an inherent power of government. A world government would necessarily control commerce, and all that bears on commerce, among the component parts and, for that matter, within them as well. The plea for world government is a plea that the American people should divest their own Government of control of commerce with other nations and place that control in a superior state. Along with it, just as surely, would go control of commerce within the Nation.

Perhaps that is what the American people want. One must emphasize the necessity of making completely sure of it first lest we deceive ourselves and the world by a false declaration of intention.

Let us consider next another inherent power of government, the power to take over property and control it for its own use.

The world government would be able to exercise eminent domain anywhere in the United States. It would do so in accordance with its own procedures and for such purposes as it might deem proper. Its power to do so would be beyond challenge by any local unit of government. Have the proponents of this measure adequately considered the implications of this? Have they revealed those implications to the American people? Do the American people concur? No evidence at hand indicates an affirmative answer to any of these questions.

Let us consider the matter of universal allegiance and universal protection. The reciprocal relationship between them is basic to all political organization.

The new world state would impinge directly upon every inhabitant's life in its claim of allegiance. It would be universal throughout its domain. On the other hand, the world citizen would have the right to claim the world government's protection wherever he might go. In our own constitutional history it was early developed that the right to move freely about in the area of the sovereign was inherent in the individual's claim of protection in return for the obligation of allegiance. The protection which the Federal Government extended to a New Yorker was not confined to the limits of New York. The man of Wisconsin did not cease to have a claim for protection at the moment of passing into Illinois. The right to move about within the area covered by the sovereign's protection was inherent in the reciprocal obligation of allegiance and protection.

What does that mean when applied to the proposed world state? It means, for one thing, the end of immigration restrictions in the United States. If it does not mean that, then there is no good to be served in talking about the world state, for a state in which the obligation to protect was compartmentalized would be a state without a universal claim upon allegiance, and therefore no state at all.

Now it may be that the American people are ready to knock down the immigration bars and invite the whole world in. It may be that they are ready to yield control over such things to a working majority of a mythical world legislature. Nothing in the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Affairs indicates this, however, and in the absence of clear proof, it would be presumptuous of the Congress to issue a declaration indicating any such willingness.

Let us look also at the implications of the universality of impact of a world government.

The world government would govern in every section of every land, including this land. Its writ would be effective in every neighborhood. Its marshals, its agents of investigation and enforcement, of whatever national origins, would be empowered to proceed on their business independent of local restrictions. Its power could reach down and touch every individual. Its courts could take cognizance of offenses against the world law wherever committed. The citizens of every American town would be subject to trial before the world judges in whatever venue might be appropriate under the procedure of the world courts.

Is that what the American people and their Congress want? If they do, they should say so more clearly. If they do not, they should not say anything to mislead anyone into thinking they do.

Some exponents of world government contend, of course, that the desire for peace is so great that such considerations as the ones expressed above are of secondary importance. Their plea stems from the sincere belief that the urgency for security among the American people and other peoples is so compelling that, given the opportunity, they would all willingly merge their national prerogatives in one central governing power to the degree necessary to insure tranquillity throughout the world. One cannot question the desire for peace or the need of it. One may, however, question the historical validity of the hope that peace is necessarily to be achieved through widening the area of sovereignty.

This hope is only a postulate. It rests on no historic experience. It is asserted, like the dogmatic panacea of the classless society, as a simple refuge from the complexities of reality. People who find the burdens and anxieties of the world about them intolerable have ever been wont to recreate the world in the image of their wishes. It is seductively easy to alleviate the threat of war first by identifying it with the circumstances that the world is divided into many states and second by imagining a world consisting of only one state.

The fallacy is exposed by a glance at history.

Peace can break down within a sovereign's domain as well as upon the periphery. There are civil wars as well as international wars. History gives examples without number. Only one needs to be cited, however. The great constitutional experiment of 1787 in our own country did not resolve the fundamental issues for the American people. Those issues remained to be resolved on the battlefield in the 1860's.

The memory of this is strong in the American consciousness. The American people will want and are entitled to ask, and to have answered, one very fundamental question before the Congress undertakes to pledge them in the cause of a world state. That question is this: Is the world state essentially a formula for abolishing international wars, or is it essentially a pattern for widening the scope, and therefore the tragedy, of civil wars?

Until that question has been explored and unless the American people are satisfied that world government would indeed be an avenue to the hopes which its proponents assert, this Congress would be ill-advised to pledge them in support of the proposition.

I turn now to a discussion of the inappropriateness of a concurrent resolution as a means of registering the national will on this matter of such vast importance, and of the necessity of cleaning up the constitutional obstacles before taking action leading toward establishment of a world state.

One thing in the American experience germane to the issue is the fact that the constitutional fathers realized that no agent of government could properly be called upon to destroy that which he had been sworn to uphold. They realized that the Federal Constitution, as a successor to the Articles of Confederation, would destroy the Articles. They realized that the Federal Constitution, in impinging upon the States, would destroy in a measure powers which the States had under their constitutions. They realized, therefore, that the Federal Constitution had to be brought into effect by a process independent of existing agencies of government. Accordingly they went directly to the people.

We must apply the same principles in this instance.

A world federation enacting, interpreting, and enforcing world law would supersede and extinguish the Constitution of the United States.

The Congress cannot properly call upon the members of the executive establishment to work for the impairment and extinction of the Constitution—the very instrument that members of the executive establishment are sworn to uphold and defend.

No member of the executive establishment could properly work toward the establishment of a world state even with the passage of one of these resolutions, which would merely be an expression of the sense of the Congress. Section 1037 of Cannon's Precedents of the House of Representatives says:

> A concurrent resolution is without force and effect beyond the confines of the Capitol.

We cannot realistically expect such a resolution to have any effect on the ends of American foreign policy. It would be nothing but an expression indicating a pattern of piety in our wishes. It could not possibly prevail as against the power of the oath taken by members of the executive establishment to uphold and defend the Constitution.

One may doubt that the Congress could properly pass such a resolution even if it had binding effect. This doubt is based upon consciousness of the oath taken by all Members to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States. It binds them just as definitely as it binds the members of the executive establishment.

Some proponents of the resolutions in question have cited as precedents House Concurrent Resolution 25 and Senate Resolution 192, Seventy-eighth Congress. The former, known generally as the Fulbright resolution, passed the House of Representatives on September 21, 1943. The latter, known generally as the Connally resolution, passed the Senate on November 5, 1943. A careful examination of their language shows that neither is a proper precedent for the present resolutions.

The Fulbright resolution was an expression favoring "the creation of appropriate international machinery adequate to establish and to maintain a just and lasting peace, among the nations of the world, and * * * participation by the United States therein through its constitutional processes."

The Connally resolution favored United States participation "with free and sovereign nations in the establishment and maintenance of international authority with power to prevent aggression and to preserve the peace of the world." It recognized "the necessity of there being established a general international organization, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states."

Neither of the above resolutions attempted to predetermine the attributes of the organization envisaged. Neither aimed at the creation of a world superstate. Neither aimed at the creation of a new political authority which would supersede the authority of the Constitution of the United States. Neither of them attempted in any measure to extinguish powers vested under the Constitution. Both of them were entirely appropriate as expressions of the will of the Congress or one of its bodies completely in keeping with their constitutional responsibilities. Neither of them sought to impose upon the Executive a line of policy which the Executive's constitutional obligations could not tolerate.

To undertake the course envisaged in the present resolution—or to attempt to lead the world into thinking we are undertaking such a course—without thoroughgoing debate into all the particulars would be dangerous in the extreme. The proposition in these resolutions should be rejected. It is an invitation for a sentimental journey into a blind alley.

The implications of the resolutions are so vast as they concern our constitutional system that the course proposed should not be undertaken except through a solemn constitutional process. The Constitution provides an appropriate procedure in the amendment process.

An appropriate amendment would be one to authorize the President to enter into negotiations looking toward a world government under which characteristics of the American Constitution would be submerged and destroyed to the extent necessary to make such a world government possible. It might also authorize the Congress, specifically the Senate, to take action on such an instrument of government once it had been formulated.

With such an amendment before the American public, that public would be able to see steadily and wholly what the implications of world government are. After such debate, and after a solemn referendum, we should then know what we mean and what we are doing. The world, furthermore, would be assured that our intentions are deliberate and firm and not the mere expression of a passing aspiration arrived at after negligible consideration.

There could be no doubt that the Executive would be empowered to proceed along the path of negotiations toward world government if a constitutional amendment were put into effect authorizing him to do so. There could be no doubt of the power of the Congress, or of the Senate in particular in regard to its share in the treaty-making procedure, to participate in the process if the Constitution were so amended as to open up the avenue to a supersession of the Constitution. The Constitution would not impose an impediment in the path to world government if the Constitution were so amended as to clear the way.

The impulse for such an amendment should come from the States. The States, by affirmative action of the legislatures of a two-thirds majority of them, can bring about a national convention to originate amendments to the Constitution. Such amendments become fully valid when affirmed by the legislatures or by conventions in three-fourths of the States, whichever course may be determined upon in the proposal. The reason for the suggestion that any movement to supersede the Constitution should be under the process indicated is that it would ill become any agents of this Government, having direct constitutional responsibilities, whether in the executive branch or the legislative branch, to originate a formal effort to supersede the Constitution.

If the sentiment for world government is as great as the proponents of these resolutions assert it is, then there could be no doubt that the great referendum on this issue would provide an affirmative result. If it is not sufficiently great to produce this result—and one may surely doubt that it is—then this Congress and this Nation should withhold any action that might mislead the world about our intentions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVENPORT] is recognized for 5 minutes.

TREATY WITH IRELAND

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, I noticed in the papers of Sunday last that a Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation had been concluded on Saturday and signed in Dublin by the Government of the United States and by the Government of Ireland. I should like to take this opportunity of conveying my congratulations, through the medium of this House and its record, to the State Department for their wisdom in concluding such a treaty with a country which has always been friendly to us and with a country which, as I pointed out in my speech of September 26, 1949, in this House, has contributed so many of its people to this great country of ours. No Member will dispute with me that friendship, amity to the greatest extent has always existed between Ireland and the United States, but I am glad, I am proud, to see this friendship registered by the treaty to which I now refer. We have always had the friendship of Ireland. We always will have it. But I can assure the Members of the House, and I know that I speak for a great many of them, that this is one treaty which will be upheld by the signers not only in the letter, but in the spirit. This will be no mere scrap of paper to be discarded when expediency or opportunity makes it appear profitable. No, indeed. This, I am sure, will be a treaty which will be adhered to completely and again I should like to congratulate most wholeheartedly those officers of the State Department who have concluded this treaty and I venture to prophesy that this is one treaty which will encounter no obstacle in the Senate when the time comes to ratify it there.

There was a feeling around—one felt it in the air—that our great State Department was not quite as interested in Ireland as it might be. I am pleased, therefore, to see this evidence of the actual work of the State Department in promoting friendship with Ireland and I hope that it will give the lie to those who say that America is not interested in the fate of Ireland. There are other aspects of our relationship with Ireland which are not treated in the document that was signed in Dublin on Saturday by our Minister to Ireland, the Honorable George Garrett, and by the very able Irish Minister of External Affairs, the Honorable Sean McBride, but I do not propose at this stage to raise those questions which I mentioned in my previous speeches on the floor of this House. I can only say that I sincerely hope that before too long other evidences of the friendship borne by this country to Ireland will be made public.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I yield.

Mr. McDONOUGH. I compliment the gentleman on making this observation at this time. May I ask the gentleman this question. In his opinion does he think it is not about time for the United States to send an Ambassador instead of a Minister to a country as prominent as Ireland among the nations of the world?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I am glad the gentleman brought that question up. We have small nations like Pakistan and Afghanistan which have the status of an embassy. Yet, the Irish representation here has the status only of a legation. I know the deep interest of the gentleman in the matter, and I hope that within a matter of a month or perhaps 2 months, we may have news that the representation will be raised to that of an embassy.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I yield.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. I agree most heartily with the worthy gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVENPORT] in all that he has said today, and join with him in his rejoicing that the initial step has been taken, most probably, to make a great free Ireland, eventually a country with an ambassador status. A united Ireland, territorially, as it has been always heroically since the very twilight of civilization on down through the years when it was the educational and religious fountainhead of the world and through the dark days of persecution and up to this very important hour in this world's peculiarly patterned history.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I yield.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Your utterances have always been timely and worth while on the floor of the House. I appreciate the gentleman's reference to this very important treaty between the Irish people and the people of America. At my own expense last fall I went to Ireland, as well as to other European countries. While there I met our Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, George A. Garrett and his gracious wife. I hope he will be given his share of the credit in bringing about this very fine and friendly relationship which has grown up between our two countries and which has resulted in this fine treaty.

I also hope that he may be the first to enjoy the status of Ambassador to the great land of Ireland.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I thank the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I yield.

Mr. MULTER. I assure you sir, that the sons of Aaron join with the sons of Erin in their rejoicing on this momentous occasion.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANKIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement made by the Commander of the AMVETS, the American Veterans of World War II, before the Committee on Veterans Affairs.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 25, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 25, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, who art the light of all our seeing, we thank Thee for this quiet moment when facing bewildering human issues, with heavy responsibilities committed to our hands, we can look away from things seen to things unseen and confidently express our faith in God we trust. We come asking that in the secret places of the inner life there may be those spiritual deposits and resources, that strength of conviction, that loyalty to ideals, that scorn of cowardly expediency, that shall give poise and courage and an undeviating devotion to the right as Thou dost give us to see the right. We ask it in the name that is above every name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. HAYDEN, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, January 24, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 152) authorizing the printing of additional copies of the hearings relative to the Federal Fair Employment Practices Act for the use of the Committee on Education and Labor, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CALL OF THE ROLL

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement entered into yesterday, the time today until the hour of 1:30 o'clock is to be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents of the pending joint resolution, and controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. HAYDEN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WHERRY. It is understood, I assume, that the time consumed by the quorum call will be taken equally from the proponents and the opponents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hill	Martin
Anderson	Hoey	Maybank

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WITHERS] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] is absent on important public business.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] is unavoidably absent.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire

[Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS] are necessarily absent.

The junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. DARBY], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], and the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] are absent by leave of the Senate.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] are absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. GEORGE, and by unanimous consent, the Finance Committee was authorized to meet this afternoon during the session of the Senate.

On request of Mr. MAYBANK, and by unanimous consent, the Subcommittee on the Treasury and Post Office of the Appropriations Committee was authorized to meet during the remainder of the session of the Senate today.

On request of Mr. MCFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Foreign Relations was authorized to meet this afternoon during the session of the Senate.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 25) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Chair has stated, the time from now until 1:30 o'clock is equally divided between the proponents and opponents of the joint resolution and controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I should like to say a word on the subject of the equal rights amendment, Senate Joint Resolution 25, now pending before the Senate. As a long-time cosponsor of this proposal it has been my firm conviction that the time is overdue for the submittal to the respective States of this proposed constitutional amendment in order that they in turn may come to a decision on this long-debated theme.

I call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that the amendment does not of itself have the force of law even following a two-thirds vote of both Houses. Rather, its validation is dependent upon ratification by three-fourths of the States.

I congratulate all the many alert women of our Nation banded together in organizations which have fought the good fight for a full century in order to assure fair and equal treatment for the members of their sex. They secured a partial victory when the nineteenth amendment was ratified in 1920, assuring both male and female citizens equal political rights as voters. However, that amendment did not assure them equal legal rights and from that flaw has stemmed the demand for enactment of the current amendment.

During the Eightieth Congress, it was my pleasure to serve as chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary which favorably reported the amendment to the Senate. However, that was but one occasion in the 27 consecutive years in which the proposed amendment, in one form or another, has been before the Congress. Since 1923, as cited yesterday by my able colleague from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], 26 different hearings have been held on it.

I call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that both major party platforms have endorsed the amendment. I believe, Mr. President, that a promise is a promise, that a platform pledge should not be broken, and that it is altogether fitting and proper that we keep the faith with the women of the Nation and submit the amendment to the States for ratification. Surely that is in keeping with the spirit of democracy.

We all recognize that some of the leading legal minds in the land have given different analyses of the effect of the amendment. However, it is a fact that the respective State legislatures are more than competent to evaluate those legal analyses and come to their own decision. Surely the judgment of such outstanding organizations as the National Women's Party, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, and many other outstanding groups which have endorsed the amendment cannot lightly be dismissed.

The amendment does not require uniformity of laws among the 48 States. It grants no new rights. It merely declares that no law passed by either the Congress or by any State legislature shall be constitutional if such law denies equality of rights on account of sex.

It is my hope, therefore, and I believe it is the hope of the women of Wisconsin, that the Congress will pass the pending joint resolution and refer the amendment to the States for their own judgment. Our action will mark another forward step in the progress of womankind.

Mr. President, I will vote against all pending amendments offered from the floor, because I feel that it is rather inappropriate for the Senate to decide in a few moments on entirely new amendments which have never been submitted before but which should more appropriately have been presented for debate long before this. With all due respect to my able colleague from Arizona, I feel that the Hayden amendment is particularly unjustified, because it offers in one breath a constitutional change and in the next embodies a direct contradiction of that change. In one paragraph it would grant women equality and in a second wipe out that equality by granting special benefits and exemptions. The confusion that would result from the Hayden amendment would becloud all possible action in the States. I feel that out of respect for the 30 national women's organizations with a membership of approximately 40,000,000, we in the Senate should adopt the original amendment as offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] and cosponsors.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I now yield 10 minutes to the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Wyoming is proud to have the privilege of sponsoring, together with some 30 other Members of this distinguished body, the equal-rights amendment. In doing so I am carrying on a tradition which has been in vogue in the State of Wyoming for some 81 years, for it was in the year 1869 that the first territorial legislature of my State convened, and it passed a women's suffrage act which was not only the first of its kind to be adopted in this Nation, but, I am advised, the first in all the world.

Again, Mr. President, in the Wyoming constitutional convention of 1889 proposition No. 25, providing for equal suffrage for women, was written into the State constitution. So I am pleased to support in the Senate of the United States a theory which has been in vogue in my own State so long and from which the State of Wyoming takes its name as the Equality State.

It is strange to relate, however, Mr. President, that it was only last year, 1949, or 80 years later, that the Equality State finally, by an act of the legislature, permitted women to serve on juries in the district courts of the State. It is to obviate such situations or such injustices at this time that I have lent my wholehearted support to the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 25.

Mr. President, in passing I might say that in the original act of 1869 in the Wyoming Legislature crippling amendments were submitted. It would be very interesting, I think, if I were to comment briefly on some of those amendments. The original bill referred to the fair sex as "ladies." An amendment was submitted, the purpose of which was to delete the word "ladies" and insert the words "squaws and colored women."

Another crippling amendment, as I remember from reading Wyoming history, was submitted, the purpose of which was to lay the bill on the table until July 4, 100 years hence.

Mr. President, the enactment of the nineteenth amendment was thought to give women full equality with men. Actually, however, all it accomplished was simply to provide all women who were citizens of the United States with the unquestionable right to vote. It was then necessary for them, through efforts exerted in the legislatures of the several States, to attempt to get the other discriminatory statutes written off the books. In this effort they have been partially successful, but many States still maintain and enforce laws which are discriminatory against both married women and employed women.

I cannot help but feel, and in this I know thousands of men and women in all walks of life join me, that it is unfair with one hand to give to a woman the right to vote in a democratic system of government and with the other hand make it impossible for her to follow her chosen line of work, which may be the only work in which she is trained or which she is capable of doing, by allowing, as I have said, discriminatory wage-and-hour legislation to be written into State laws. Nor is it fair and equitable for an individual State to determine that a woman citizen of the State cannot bring a tort action for injury received to her own person unless her husband joins in the action, or cannot deed her own property without having her husband as a cograntor, or that a woman must have a court order or her husband's consent before she can establish a business or keep the profits from such business. Laws such as these make one gasp by their outmodedness and discrimination, but they exist in some States. In the States where they do exist, by the enactment of Senate Joint Resolution 25, we shall make it possible for a constitutional amendment on the subject subsequently to be adopted, thus removing any such discriminations.

Mr. President, our Constitution does not specifically differentiate between men and women, nor do the constitutions of the States having laws such as those just cited. But our courts, following the old English law, have interpreted the constitutions to apply only to men, thus making it necessary to specifically provide for the women of this country.

Mr. President, during the recent war, many of the barriers against women were dropped entirely or partially relaxed through necessity, and we found that the women of the United States willingly accepted the burdens cast upon them in military service and in war production; they joined shoulder-to-shoulder with the men of the Nation in our gigantic effort. Let us, therefore, before these barricades become inalterably entrenched again, amend our Constitution to provide "equal justice under law"—the motto which we have caused to be carved on our Supreme Court Building. The one and only way of assuring this equal justice is by passage of Senate Joint Resolution 25 by this body, and then by untiring work to secure the ratification of the amendment by the necessary number of States.

Mr. President, in the event this body, the distinguished United States Senate, should deem it necessary to withhold equal rights from one-half of our population, I contend that they should not be withheld from the better half.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa yielded 10 minutes to the Senator from Wyoming, and 2 minutes of that time remain. Does the Senator from Iowa wish to use further time at this point?

Mr. GILLETTE. No, Mr. President; I am glad to have the opponents now use some of their time.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, how much time remains to those on our side of the question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-seven minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN] 7 minutes, or as much thereof as he wishes to use.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from New York is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I rise for the second time in the last 2 days to oppose the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 25. I do so because I believe the joint resolution, far from conferring additional rights on women, may greatly curtail or destroy the rights they have today.

For 40 years, both before I entered public life and since then, I have been working in behalf of the safeguarding and protection of the rights of women. Women have made tremendous progress in the rights they have obtained in the various States of the Union. In the State of New York, which I have the honor in part to represent, and I am sure in all the other States of the Union, there has developed during those 40 years a great mass of social and labor legislation in protection of women. Moreover, there have grown up important legal traditions and court decisions. Today, in most States, women are being protected in connection with conditions of work, minimum wages, maximum hours, domestic relations, divorce and alimony proceedings, in support of the family and in many other ways. I am convinced that all these protections will be placed in great jeopardy if Senate Joint Resolution 25 is enacted. No judge or responsible lawyer has told me that there can possibly be any assurance that the great mass of legislative enactments and legal traditions and decisions which have been built up over many decades will be safeguarded if the pending joint resolution is passed. I doubt very much whether they will be safeguarded even if the amendment which has been offered by the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] is adopted, since I believe there will always be a legal question with regard to whether a law now on the statute books or to be passed at a later date will be construed to impair any of the rights, benefits, or exemptions which may be conferred by law upon persons of the female sex, or whether such enactments are contrary to the body of the joint resolution and the subsequent amendment proposed to be incorporated into the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator object to yielding for an inquiry?

Mr. LEHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PEPPER. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. LEHMAN. I should prefer to continue, and then I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. PEPPER. Certainly.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, what is to be gained by the passage of this joint resolution? I know of no State in the Union in which women suffer political disabilities at the present time. They can run for office, whether it be that of President of the United States or Vice President or Member of the Senate or Member of the House of Representatives, or officer in any unit of government within the United States. Women can hold any office, either in public or in private life. There are today virtually no limitations on the employment of women. The only one I know of in the State of New York is a prohibition against permitting women to work in the mines of the State.

Mr. President, in my opinion this joint resolution confers absolutely no additional rights of any kind upon women. It seeks to correct some of the disabilities which exist because of prejudice or because of custom. But the proposed constitutional amendment will not serve that purpose. If a man wishes to employ a man doctor, he is not going to employ a woman doctor simply because of the amendment which it is proposed to have incorporated in the Constitution. If a man wishes to employ a man lawyer, he is not going to be forced into employing a woman lawyer. If a man wishes to promote someone in his office or give employment to someone, he is not going to be compelled by the passage of this joint resolution or any other measure or by any provision in the Constitution of the United States to act contrary to his judgment.

Mr. President, I think the risk involved in passing this joint resolution is far too great. Undoubtedly if the amendment to the Constitution shall finally be adopted, we shall jeopardize the great mass of protective, social, and labor legislation which has been built up; we shall risk and shall place in jeopardy the court decisions and the legal traditions which have been established. Certainly at best there cannot possibly be any doubt in the mind of anyone that the passage of the joint resolution will place in great jeopardy all the enactments I have enumerated, and hundreds in addition thereto.

I think the joint resolution, if passed, will do a great disservice to the women of the country. I deeply hope it will be defeated in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York has half a minute remaining.

Mr. PEPPER. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not know he was speaking under a limitation of time.

I was going to ask the able Senator what type of legislation favorable to women, now upon the statute books, does he believe would be impaired or invalidated if the proposed constitutional amendment were adopted.

Mr. LEHMAN. In my State, I think the statute covering minimum wages for women, inasmuch as under the State constitution no minimum wage is permitted for men, would certainly be declared unconstitutional. I believe the limitation on hours of work of women would be declared unconstitutional, because in our State there is no limitation upon the hours of work of men. I believe the question of support of children and alimony would certainly be placed in very great jeopardy. These are only a few of our statutes which might be destroyed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. IVES].

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, yesterday and again today in this debate on the proposed constitutional amendment aimed to provide equal rights for women, a strong case has been made against the amendment itself. Amendments to the amendment are being offered, and it would appear that on the basis of the intrinsic merit of the proposed constitutional amendment alone, as it stands and of itself, it might not receive sufficient support in the Senate to permit its approval.

I listened yesterday with much interest, as I have again today, to the remarks of my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], in which he gave a partial outline of the many legislative enactments in our State which, over the years, have been provided for the special protection of women. As he so generously indicated in his remarks, I also contributed in substantial degree in promoting many of these legislative enactments. I concur with many of his observations regarding the merit of the proposed constitutional amendment itself, although I feel that the situation which it provokes is one open to broad and searching debate and probable court determination.

I am not speaking in favor of the proposed constitutional amendment. I am speaking on what I consider to be the primary question before the Senate—the matter of the submission of this amendment to the States for ratification or rejection.

As has been pointed out so frequently in this debate, this question has been before the Congress for 27 years. During this same period the submission of the amendment to the States for ratification has frequently been advocated in platform planks of both major political parties. It has been a constantly recurring question. It is one which cannot be ignored.

Neither do I believe that it can be resolved satisfactorily by the alternative proposal in the form of the substitute amendment, meritorious though such a proposal may be in and of itself and apart from the main question of the proposed constitutional amendment. It seems to me that this proposed constitutional amendment is so vital and so far-reaching in its implications and potential consequences that it should be submitted for the individual consideration of the several States.

Affecting the fundamental rights of the States themselves to so great degree as does this proposed constitutional amendment, the States in turn by direct action should be required to make the decision. Each State knows far better than can we in the Congress how the proposed amendment might affect it.

Furthermore, this is a very basic matter in our society which would have a direct and powerful effect upon the well-being of at least half of our population. Probably no amendment to the Constitution having a greater effect upon more people in the United States has ever been proposed. Here again it seems to me to be of the utmost importance that the States themselves should be called upon to make direct and individual determination.

At the same time, two of the amendments which have been proposed, the one by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], which would place a time limitation for ratification, and the one offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], which is aimed to prevent any impairment of "any rights, benefits, or exemptions conferred by law upon persons of the female sex," seems to be most desirable.

As a former member of the legislature of my State for many years, I long ago became convinced of the ever present need for a time limit for the ratification of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and I long ago reached the personal decision that I would not support any proposed constitutional amendment, no matter how meritorious, unless it carried with it such a time limitation provision.

For the reasons I have briefly indicated, I expect to vote in favor of Senate Joint Resolution 25, if either the amendment to it offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] or one of a similar nature is adopted. In so voting, however, I do not wish my action to be construed in any sense as an endorsement of the proposed constitutional amendment itself.

I thank the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I yield myself 15 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I am unable to treat lightly any proposal to change or alter the organic law of our country. In my opinion any measure seeking to change or repeal any provision of the Constitution of the United States or to insert a new section should be weighed most carefully by the Members of the Congress before it is passed to the States with our approval. The mere fact that the amendment has been pending in one form or other before the Congress for a number of years is, to me, of itself no endorsement. Believing that it is neither necessary nor desirable, I shall vote against the submission of the amendment to the States.

Mr. President, the amendment is a Pandora's box. If it is opened, no living human being can possibly estimate the consequences that will flow from such action. It will cause confusion unspeakable. It will strike down any number of salutary statutes enacted by the legislatures of the 48 States for the protection or for the benefit of women. It will likewise jeopardize or eliminate any number of ordinances approved by the governing bodies of the municipalities of the Nation dealing with the same subject. It will be a blow at the philosophy of local self-government, in which I firmly believe. Approval in its present form will be more dire in its consequences than any man can possibly predict at this juncture. It bears a euphonious title, the title of "Equal Rights." Of late, Mr. President, we have frequently seen legislation submitted to the Congress that had little to commend it other than the euphony of the title of the proposed act. We should not enact legislation merely because it is given an attractive label.

I have made no study of this subject in detail, but I know that in my own State the adoption of the amendment would take away rights which are absolutely vital to the women of my State. We have provisions in the laws of my State under which any woman and her minor children may obtain a year's support from the estate of a decedent husband, even prior to many claims of creditors which may be involved. What would be the effect of the amendment? Would it be to deny the women of the States which have the year's support law or similar statutes, the right to a year's support, or would it confer a year's support upon the husband in case of the death of a wife who owned property?

In my own State we have statutes which entitle women to alimony and to support, and even criminal statutes, under which a husband can be punished for failure to support his family. What would be the effect of the amendment upon those statutes? Would it deny those rights to all married women or would it create for all husbands the right of alimony and the right of support from the wife.

I could proceed almost without end to recite various laws which exist in practically all the States, and which are very beneficial to the women of the country, and, more than that, to the children for whose care they are especially charged. We have a rule of law in my own State, and I am sure it obtains in a great many other States, that, unless there is some overriding reason to the contrary, based upon the bad character of the wife, she is entitled, in case of separation, to have the custody of minor children. What effect would the amendment have upon those laws? No man can safely predict. We have statutes which have been enacted to protect women who are now engaged in earning their livelihood in my State, and in nearly all others. Would the amendment strike down those statutes, or would it give the same rights and privileges to men, and thereby stop the operations of hundreds of industries which are compelled to perform certain types of work which women cannot do under laws for their protection.

Mr. President, I cannot conceive of a more mischievous proposition than the one now pending before the Senate. It would take away from city councils and city aldermanic boards the right to pass any regulation or ordinance for the benefit of women, unless it applied equally to men. It would deny to the legislatures of the 48 States the right to legislate for the protection of women in any degree, unless the same rights were conferred upon men. It would deny to the Congress of the United States the right to enact legislation for the benefit and protection of women, unless the same rights were accorded to men.

Mr. President, my objections to the amendment are many. There is another fundamental objection to the proposal. It not only denies to the State legislative bodies, the municipal law-making agencies, and the Congress the right to enact laws in this field, but it transfers law-making power in the fields of descent and distribution, domestic relations and the protection of women in industry, from all the State legislative bodies, who are elected by the people for that purpose, to the Supreme Court of the United States. In the last analysis, if the amendment be approved, that is where the laws will be written in those fields. Almost every question that can be conceived of, dealing with these subjects will become immediately a constitutional question in the Federal courts of the land, and it will give to the Supreme Court a tremendous legislative power in the field of policy, which I do not think should be vested in that Court.

Indeed, Mr. President, the Court has shown a disposition, particularly of late years, to invade the legislative field, and to legislate in areas where it claims to find a vacuum, or no law. If we strike down the great mass of these laws, which either stem from the common law or have been enacted over a period of 200 years, it will be an invitation to the Supreme Court of the United States to legislate and declare policy in detail in the field of domestic relations, laws of descent and distribution, and laws that pertain to the protection of women in industry. I cannot conceive of a more grievous blow to the right of local self-government in this country, with the centralization of power over the lives of our people in one building here in Washington, than would result if the amendment were adopted.

Mr. President, I have often inquired of those who have approached me and have sought to enlist my support of the amendment as to just what rights they were seeking. I knew a great many rights which would be taken from women, but I have asked as to the rights which would be conferred upon them if the amendment were adopted. I have had a number of answers to the question, but the most substantial one has been that it would confer the right to serve upon juries in every State. I am not too sure of that, as a matter of law, because there is a grave question as to whether service on a jury is a duty or a right. I do not know whether the proposed constitutional amendment would even confer that as a right, but if it did, it is absosolutely unnecessary, for the Congress to take this drastic step in other fields, in order to assure the right to serve upon juries. Mr. President, I make the statement, without fear of successful contradiction, that when any considerable number of women in any State of the 48 States desire to serve upon juries, all that it is necessary for them to do is to go to the State capital of their State and they will be granted the right immediately by the State legislatures. The State legislatures seek the votes of women, just as we seek them when we are candidates for Federal office, and the political power of women in the several States would be as great or greater than it would be here to secure the right to serve upon juries, if they so desire. I, for one, Mr. President, am not in favor of forcing the women who might not choose to serve on juries to do so through a constitutional amendment, particularly in view of the unrelated evil consequences which would flow from adding this unnecessary language to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, I do not believe any considerable number of women in this Nation desire this constitutional amendment. It is claimed that there is a great body of sentiment in favor of it, but, in my opinion, the fact that resolutions of this character have been presented from year to year is the clearest illustration of the danger in which the country stands of succumbing to the clamor of minority groups who are vocal and who constantly press their claims upon the Congress and upon the other organizations which contribute to the operations of our Government.

That declarations in favor of such an amendment have appeared frequently in the platforms of both political parties, in my opinion, is due to the fact there have been a few good women, who, in their mistaken zeal, have appeared before the platform committees in political conventions and have insisted upon the inclusion of this subject in the catch-all platforms of the political parties. I do not believe that there is any ground swell from the masses of women of the Nation in favor of any such legislation. On the contrary, I am confident that if the effect of the proposition were fully explained to all of the women of the United States, they would bitterly oppose it. A great many women's organizations are already fighting against its adoption and it is unlikely that a majority of the women favor it now, even with its attractive title.

It so happens that the women who are engaged most actively in rearing families or in industry sometimes do not have the means of expression through organizations such as are possessed by other groups. It is no commendation of the merits of the issue that it has been contained in party platforms and has been pressed from year to year. To me it is only an indication of the unwholesome effect of the power of pressure groups and organizations which is made manifest in many other ways than in this proposed amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. President, I have proposed an amendment to the resolution providing that if enacted, the proposed constitutional change may be permitted to pend before the State legislatures for only 5 years. I have discussed the time limit with a number of Senators favoring the resolution, and I think there is very general agreement that it is unwise not to adopt some time limitation on the constitutional amendment if it be proposed to the States. The most recent amendment provided for a period of 7 years, and my amendment, as modified now, provides for a period of 7 years for the proposal to be before the legislatures of the several States.

Mr. President, I ask at this stage to have printed in the RECORD a letter which I received this morning from Mr. William Green, of the American Federation of Labor, in opposition to the joint resolution; a letter from Mr. Nathan E. Cowan, director, legislative department, Congress of Industrial Organizations, opposing the adoption of the joint resolution, and a statement signed by a number of eminent jurists and lawyers, and deans of law schools, pointing out a few of the evil consequences which will flow from the adoption of the resolution.

There being no objection, the letters and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1950.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The American Federation of Labor firmly opposes the enactment of the equal-rights amendment now under consideration by the Senate, and supports the women's status bill. The American Federation of Labor believes in actual equal rights for men and women which will protect the status of all women and not merely wealthy women. Furthermore, being especially interested in the home and the well-being of the child, it is seriously alarmed because the equal-rights amendment will destroy all laws which recognize a specific responsibility for the support of minor children.

We believe in specific legislation through which to wipe out specific inequalities which work to the detriment of women. The proposed equal-rights amendment would destroy all existing legislation which recognizes different but not lesser responsibilities of women. We quote the late Mr. Justice Hughes who stated, in upholding a minimum wage law for women, "You cannot change the sex of a person by a mere stroke of the pen." We recognize not only the different physical capacities of women and hence the need for different standards of employment in certain cases, but we recognize also the actual fact that until women have reached a period of organization through which they may bargain effectively along with men, that it is necessary to give them a base below which no employer may place them in regard to wages, hours, and other working conditions.

While we realize that in time each State would no doubt enact laws which would protect the well-being of the child, we submit that until such laws are enacted the wiping out of present support laws would work a tremendous harm to thousands of our children.

We, therefore, will continue to urge specific laws to repeal specific inequalities, and oppose blanket legislation as contained in the equal-rights amendment through which much more harm than good would be accomplished.

We urge that you support and vote in accordance with our position regarding this proposal as set forth above.

Very truly yours,

W. GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1950.

DEAR SENATOR: On behalf of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, I am writing you to once more state our opposition to the so-called equal-rights amendment, Senate Joint Resolution 25.

The CIO has consistently opposed this proposed amendment on the basis that it strikes down all State and Federal labor laws enacted for the benefit of women. Utter chaos would result in this field were the amendment to be adopted.

Mr. Philip Murray, president of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, has previously pointed out that the proposal "actually conceals the means of robbing women of the rights and protections that have been won for them."

Mr. Murray has further stated: "It would not secure equality of treatment for women, except at the heavy cost of abandoning the great body of laws that protect women workers from exploitation.

"Laws limiting the hours women may be required to work, regulating health and other working conditions, securing minimum-wage rates in traditionally low-paid industries, and the like, would cease to be effective if this amendment were to become part of our Constitution.

"In addition, laws and other beneficial provisions such as maternity aid, widows' pensions, aid for dependent children, and other social-security protective measures that apply 'unequally' to women would also be abolished.

"We submit that this would not mean 'equal rights,' but would return women workers to conditions that they and the organized labor movement, together with Congress, have long sought to eliminate."

For these reasons we urgently request you to vote against Senate Joint Resolution 25 when it comes before you for consideration.

Sincerely yours,

NATHAN E. COWAN,
Director, CIO Legislative Department.

NATIONAL COMMITTEE ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN IN THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

The following statement on legal implications of proposed Federal equal-rights amendment has been endorsed by deans and professors of 21 leading law schools and by eminent attorneys, jurists, and constitutional lawyers, including former presidents of the American Bar Association and the general counsel for the two great labor organizations.

"The proposed amendment to the Constitution reads as follows:

" 'That equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex. Congress and the several States shall have power, within their respective jurisdictions, to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

" 'This amendment shall take effect 3 years after the date of ratification.'

"If anything about this proposed amendment is clear, it is that it would transform every provision of law concerning women into a constitutional issue to be ultimately resolved by the Supreme Court of the United States. Every statutory and common-law provision dealing with the manifold relation of women in society would be forced to run the gauntlet of attack on constitutional grounds. The range of such potential litigation is too great to be readily foreseen, but it would certainly embrace such diverse legal provisions as those relating to a widow's allowance, the obligation of family support and grounds for divorce, the age of majority, and the right of annulment of marriages, and the maximum hours of labor for women in protected industries.

"Not only is the range of the amendment of indefinite extent but, even more important, the fate of all this varied legislation would be left highly uncertain in the face of judicial review. Presumably the amendment would set up a constitutional yardstick of absolute equality between men and women in all legal relationships. A more flexible view, permitting reasonable differentiation, can hardly be regarded as the object of the proposal, since the fourteenth amendment has long provided that no State shall deny to any person the equal protection of the laws, and that amendment permits reasonable classifications while prohibiting arbitrary legal discrimination. If it were intended to give the courts the authority to pass upon the propriety of distinctions, benefits, and duties as between men and women, no new guidance is given to the courts, and this entire subject, one of unusual complexity, would be left to the unpredictable judgments of courts in the form of constitutional decisions.

"Such decisions could not be changed by act of the legislature. Such a responsibility upon the courts would be doubtless as unwelcome to them as it would be inappropriate. As has been stated, however, the proposal evidently contemplates no flexibility in construction, but rather a rule of rigid equality. This branch of the dilemma is as repelling as the other. It appears to be accepted by what is currently the most authoritative statement on this amendment—the report of the House Judiciary Committee, House Report 907, Seventy-ninth Congress, first session, on House Joint Resolution 49, dated July 12, 1945. The majority of the committee appears to recognize that, under the amendment, the many laws protecting the safety and welfare of women in industry would necessarily fall. The committee states: 'To say the least of the matter, many of the large organizations of women represented in hearings before the committee have expressed a sincere desire to waive the so-called preferential benefits now accorded to women by various laws so as to permit them to follow economic activities from which they are now excluded.'

"It would not be feasible to attempt to enumerate the wide variety of laws and rules of the common law which would fall under the impact of the amendment. Some conception of their scope may, however, be given by recalling the variety of relationships in which women stand in the community. These relationships may be summarized as (a) wage earner, (b) member of a family, (c) citizen, (d) individual. The law has recognized and attempted to deal with these relationships in a concrete way. Doubtless there are difficulties and anachronisms in the law which should be remedied. But the method adopted by the amendment is to ignore the basis for all that has been at the foundation of these measures, and to substitute an abstract rule of thumb. The practical effect of such a course can be suggested by referring briefly to each of the four categories mentioned above.

"(a) As wage earners: One of the most familiar forms of legislation is that which confers special protection on women in industry, through the prohibition of employment in hazardous occupations and through regulation of night work and maximum hours of labor. Presumably the long struggle to place these protective measures on the statute books would be set at naught by the adoption of the amendment. Specifically, such statutes would apparently have to be held invalid as denying to women the equal right to work or as denying to men the equal right of protection under the law, for, it is to be noted, the amendment requires equality of rights under the law, permitting either men or women to claim exact equality. How the problem would be met can only be left to conjecture. If a State legislature failed to revise the laws giving special protection to women in certain industries, it is left uncertain whether the entire pattern of industrial legislation would be torn apart by judicial decision or whether a court would undertake to legislate by raising the same protection for men. Surely the work of generations ought not to be left to this blind hazard.

"(b) As members of the family: Legislation in the latter part of the nineteenth and early part of the twentieth century, commonly known as married women's acts, fairly universally, in this country removed the disabilities which the common law had placed upon married women with respect to the right to sue and be sued, the right to own separate property, and the right to engage in commercial transactions. It is true that in some States certain remnants of these disabilities have persisted. In a few States, for example, a married woman may not become a surety for her husband's debts, on the theory that she might otherwise be imposed upon; if the reason which has led some States to retain this disability is not a sufficient one, the disability should, of course, be removed by further legislation.

"Similarly, in a few States a married woman's earnings, while belonging to her if they result from work outside the home, are held to inure to the husband if they are produced by working inside the home. Whether this is a fair adjustment in view of the husband's primary duty to support the family may be a fairly debatable question, which again can be resolved by further legislation if further reform is thought desirable. The proposed amendment would leave no room for legislative experiment along these lines, but would impose a requirement of absolute equality in the property rights of husband and wife.

"More seriously, it would presumably abolish the common rule whereby a husband has the primary duty of support toward his family, and whereby in many jurisdictions failure to render such support is a ground for separation or divorce. Precisely how the law of support is to be transformed as a result of the amendment is by no means clear. The concept of a primary duty does not lend itself to a rule of equality.

"The very least that can be said is that the complex and delicate field of marital relationships and divorce, into which Congress has sedulously declined to enter in the past, would now be gravely affected by the tangential force of a constitutional amendment, which would not even rest on a study of the manifold problems involved.

"It is worthy of note that the community-property systems of eight Western States, which have evolved differently from the common-law systems and which, in general, have recognized for a longer period the coordinate status of husband and wife, nevertheless contain inequalities which would doubtless be rendered invalid under the amendment. Thus the husband is generally regarded as a kind of managing partner with special powers not possessed by the wife in respect of community property. Legislation would doubtless be required to produce conformity with the dictates of the amendment, and the ramifications of such legislation, particularly with respect to the special tax status of persons owning community property, cannot be predicted with certainty.

"(c) As citizens: While the suffrage amendment and other legislation have generally guaranteed to women an equality of civil and political rights, there remain some gaps which it is undoubtedly one purpose of the amendment to close. One of these is the distinction drawn in some States between the obligation of men and that of women for jury service. But whether the amendment would in fact require a change in this field is itself uncertain, since it is fairly arguable that jury service is not a right but a duty and hence not within the scope of the amendment. Indeed, the amendment opens up a whole field of potential controversy turning on distinction between rights and duties.

"(d) As individuals. A common legislative difference in the treatment of men and women concerns the age of majority, which is generally lower for the latter. This difference has long been accepted as reflecting physical realities. Presumably the distinction would no longer be valid. But if a legislature failed to change the law, the outcome would present something of a legal puzzle. If the age of majority for men is 18 and women 16, it can hardly be foretold whether equality would require a lowering of the former or a raising of the latter. If the standard be that of the greater right, it could be asserted that the lower age for women provides a greater right to marry but at the same time a more restricted right to annul on the ground of minority. How a court would solve the conundrum is, like most problems created by the proposed amendment, a matter purely of speculation.

"The basic fallacy in the proposed amendment is that it attempts to deal with complicated and highly concrete problems arising out of a diversity of human relationships in terms of a single and simple abstraction. This abstraction is undoubtedly a worthy ideal for mobilizing legislative forces in order to remedy particular deficiencies in the law. But as a constitutional standard, it is hopelessly inept. That the proposed equal-rights amendment would open up an era of regrettable consequences for the legal status of women in this country is highly probable. That it would open up a period of extreme confusion in constitutional law is a certainty.

"PAUL FREUND,
"Professor of Law, Harvard Law School."

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, in my opinion, no rights which are substantial in nature would be conferred on the women of America by the submission and approval of this proposed constitutional amendment. To the contrary, it would result in the deprivation of substantial rights to which the women of the Nation are entitled and which they today enjoy.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will reject the joint resolution.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. Has the Senator from Georgia offered his amendment changing the time from 5 to 7 years?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, it is proposed to strike out lines 6 and 7, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within 7 years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress; and, if so ratified, shall take effect upon the expiration of 1 year after the date of such ratification.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, having consulted with some of the leaders on our side of the controversy, I will say that we shall be glad to accept the amendment as modified.

Mr. President, I yield 9 minutes to the senior Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I shall take only 5 minutes, and I ask that the Senator from Iowa yield the remainder of the time to the eloquent senior Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER].

Mr. President, the truth of the situation is that American women today have only two rights which cannot be taken away from them by their respective States. One is the right to vote, which has been granted to them by the nineteenth amendment. The other is the right to choose their citizenship if they marry aliens, which is a right granted as a result of an international treaty.

My distinguished friend from Georgia stated a while ago that if only the women of the country were informed, how differently they would feel about the matter. Let me tell my distinguished friend that for nine long years hearings after hearings were held by the Judiciary Committee, notices of which were given——

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I refuse to yield. I have only 5 minutes.

Let me say to my distinguished friend, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], that women belonging to labor unions from the State of New York appeared before the committee and testified at the very time that the Senator was Governor of New York, that they were unable to receive salaries which they earned as foremen on union jobs, because when inspectors came around the women were shoved aside, and men were put in their place temporarily, so that the inspectors would not know that women were earning the money or were doing the work.

That is not all, Mr. President.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I refuse to yield.

I wish to say, further, Mr. President, that it is strange that the women folk, who rear the families, were not permitted to be on a single draft board during World War I and World War II. It is all right for them to rear the families, but when the Government stepped in and said, "We are going to take your boy and use him for cannon fodder," not a woman was allowed to be on a draft board anywhere in the United States of America. The Government said that the reason for their exclusion was that they were only subcitizens. More recently the Comptroller ruled that women were not persons. Since women were not persons but "females" it took a special statute to enable them to serve their country as physicians.

Why did not the Senators who are opposed to the resolution come before the Judiciary Committee, which considered this measure for nine long years? The arguments that some Senators have made today were never made before that committee at all. I remember very well that when the question of woman suffrage was being considered some years ago a girl from my State, Beulah Amidon, was nearly put in jail in Washington for picketing the White House in favor of woman's suffrage.

The Committee on the Judiciary has studied this subject for 9 years. I, as one of the sponsors of this measure, together with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], am proud of the fact that the women of North Dakota and, I believe, of the Nation, have shown in medicine, in the arts and sciences, and, yes, even in the operation of farms that they are on an equality with men; and I am not at all worried at the arguments of the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] that they are going to lose all the rights and protection afforded them by the various States up to this time.

So, Mr. President, I shall support the resolution without any amendment of any kind or character.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I yield 12 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming is recognized for 12 minutes.

ISSUE SHOULD BE REFERRED TO THE STATES

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to make it clear that, so far as I am concerned, since the Judiciary Committee has unanimously recommended the submission of this constitutional amendment to the several States since the Congress of the United States has seen the resolution endorsed and recommended by committee after committee over several years, and since the matter deals with a subject which can be finally settled only by the States themselves, it is absolutely impossible for me to understand why some of our friends seek, first, to cripple the proposed amendment, as by the proposal suggested by my good friend, the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], or seek to defeat it upon the floor by arguments such as those advanced by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL]. If it be the fact—and I deny it to be the fact—that the proposed amendment to the Constitution is offered only because a vocal minority has repeatedly urged it upon the Congress, certainly such a puny minority cannot sway the legislatures of the several States to ratify the amendment.

The charge is made that the adoption of the amendment would undo benefits and exemptions which are granted by State laws. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona was not presented for consideration to the Judiciary Committee, and no one would be able to define the benefits or exemptions to which this crippling amendment refers, if I may say to my good friend from Arizona. There is no doubt, on the other hand, about the meaning of the word "rights." That word appears in a half dozen or more places in the Constitution of the United States. It is understood in fact as well as in theory.

MODERN WORLD RECOGNIZES EQUAL RIGHTS

I really believe, Mr. President, that those who are opposing the joint resolution are living in the past. They are living with those gentlemen who, in the Constitutional Convention of the State of Wyoming, to which my colleague referred in his address a few moments ago, jeered at the thought of allowing women to vote, and sought by all manner of means to prevent them from obtaining that right. But we are living at a time when all those old inhibitions, it seems to me, have been undone by the very facts of our living.

Mr. President, we have not only granted women the right to vote, but we have taken them into Congress, even into the Senate, and into the Army and the Navy. The modern world needs the services of women and requires the equality provided by the equal-rights amendment. It is merely a recognition of the conditions which exist.

ALLEGED BENEFITS REALLY HANDICAPS

If it be said on the merits that benefits and exemptions granted to women by State laws, in labor legislation, for example, would be lost, I believe there is a simple, plain argument to rebut that contention. I remember when I was a member of the Judiciary Committee, several years ago, before the Reorganization Act compelled Members of the Senate to choose only two standing committees on which to serve, women representatives of trade-unions appeared before the committee and told us how the so-called benefits were really handicaps. There was a provision of law in one State, for example, which required that no woman should be permitted to engage in night work, and the result of that was simply that competent woman proofreaders, members of the union, who were fully equipped to read proof as well as any man, and to have equal pay for the work, were denied the privilege of going on a night shift because of this mistaken benefit, which was really a handicap, which had been handed down from the dim ages of the past.

Mr. President, I say, first, to my friends who are worried by the thought that perhaps benefits and exemptions will be denied, let the people in the States solve that question. The members of the State legislatures are close to the conditions that now are found in business and industry. I say, second, let us not forget that repeatedly these so-called benefits and exemptions are used to bar women from employment they are capable of filling.

I believe the time has come to raise the standards of labor all the way down the line, and if there are any really beneficial laws applying only to women, let them also apply to men.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator knows that I am operating under a time limit.

Mr. RUSSELL. I shall be glad to yield the Senator 1 minute of my time if he will yield to me now.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Very well.

Mr. RUSSELL. I should like to ask the Senator exactly how he would apply the law which prevents women in some States from engaging in vocations where they have to lift packages of a certain size. Would he apply that law to men?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am inclined to believe that the illustration is evidence from a bygone era. Of course, neither men nor women are working nowadays like the singer in Old Man River. They do not have to "tote that barge" or "lift that bale," now as they used to. Modern technology has been doing away with labor of that kind. We have machines today to do that sort of work.

Mr. RUSSELL. So the Senator would be willing to apply to men the laws prohibiting the lifting of packages weighing as much as 50 pounds, and require every retail grocery store to install a lifting machine to lift a case of tomatoes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I recognize the great ability of the Senator from Georgia in extemporaneous debate, but I am willing to permit this matter to be handled by the people in the several States.

It is said that the proposed amendment would do away with special legislation in the States for widows or for expectant mothers, and the like. There is nothing in this amendment which would have the slightest effect in preventing the State legislatures from making such classifications. The equal-rights amendment would not deny and could not deny to any State the authority to pass a law providing special benefits for veterans, for example, on the ground that only equal rights could be granted and, therefore, that no reward could go to veterans unless it went to all men and women whether they were veterans or not. The power of the State legislatures to provide for classifications and categories of women cannot be denied.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. HUNT. Knowing the attitude of my colleague, the distinguished senior Senator from Wyoming, for a long period of years, and in view of the very fine statement which he has just made of his position, I should like to ask him three direct questions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Wyoming yield to his colleague for that purpose?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. HUNT. I ask my colleague, first, is he not for the joint resolution because it is fair?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Precisely.

Mr. HUNT. Second, is not my colleague in favor of the joint resolution because it is just?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think it is eminently just.

Mr. HUNT. Third, is not my colleague in favor of the joint resolution because it is right?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The junior Senator from Wyoming has precisely stated my attitude. I might add that I am not one of those who believe that party platforms are to be lightly dismissed as merely the declarations of a few delegates who gather in convention, and who will make promises without the intent to fulfill them merely because they think they may gather in a few votes here or there. Over and over and over again the national conventions of both political parties have declared that it was the policy of the respective parties to submit an equal-rights amendment to the people of the States for decision by them.

PARTY PLATFORM PLEDGES BINDING

I submit, Mr. President, that no Member of the Senate can lightly violate the pledge—the repeated pledge—of the party platforms. I believe that a party platform should be regarded as meaning what it says, and as binding upon the members of the respective parties. I do not take these platform declarations lightly. If there should be a pledge in the platform to which I was not willing to give my adherence, I would say so at the time. I marvel at Members of the Senate who have declared themselves as supporting fair employment practices, as supporters of the FEPC, saying, "Well, we are for the FEPC, but not when it comes to women."

Why should men and women not have equal rights? Why should we not permit the legislatures of the several States to settle this issue? It has been before the Senate year after year after year, but now, as in the past, the effort is made to defeat it by amendments which contradict the very terms of the joint resolution itself. If this measure is to be voted up or voted down, it should not be upon this floor or upon the floor of the House of Representatives; it should be voted up or down by the legislatures of the several States.

Mr. President, I am glad that the Senator from Iowa, in charge of the joint resolution, has accepted the time amendment of the Senator from Georgia. That is not a crippling amendment. It is a customary limitation of time on the process of ratification.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Will the Senator from Iowa yield me one more half a minute?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield the Senator half a minute.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was about to say that I hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona and the substitute of the Senator from Tennessee will both be rejected, as totally opposed to the plain intent and purpose of the proposed equal-rights amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I yield the remainder of our time, which I believe is 15 minutes, to the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia has 14 minutes remaining at his disposal.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, that is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] has 5 minutes under his control.

The Senator from Arizona is recognized for 14 minutes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I formally offer the amendment to which I shall address myself, and ask that it be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, between lines 4 and 5, it is proposed to insert the following:

> The provisions of this article shall not be construed to impair any rights, benefits, or exemptions conferred by law upon persons of the female sex.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Under the language of the distinguished Senator's proposed amendment, as it now stands, I suggest that there might be a construction limiting its effect to laws of the type described which are now in existence. I wonder whether the distinguished Senator will be willing to accept an amendment as follows: After the word "exemptions" in line 2, add the words "now or hereafter."

Mr. HAYDEN. I have great respect, Mr. President, for the legal judgment of the senior Senator from Colorado, and I believe he is right. I accept the suggestion made that the words he proposes be inserted in the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be modified accordingly.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the proposed amendment to the Constitution, as reported to the Senate, is based upon the fallacy that men and women are so much alike that they should, under all laws, be considered as equals. The truth is that they are not alike to any such degree. In the beginning, God made them different when male and female created He them.

No one can be born without a father and a mother, but my mother did for me what my father could not do. She brought me into the world and as a babe she took me to her breast. My father did for me what my mother could not do. He came to the wild, Apache-infested frontier and there accumulated the means to build the home that sheltered me. He provided my food and my clothing and later for my education. I always honored my father, but it was my mother who constantly watched over my health, who taught me to tell the truth, and not to cheat. It was she who instilled in me the ambition to amount to something among men. It is a treasure in my memory that shortly before she passed away my mother said that I had been a dutiful son and had never spoken an unkind word to her.

Knowing that men and women are inherently different, plain common sense tells me that the law can recognize that difference by granting rights and benefits and exemptions to women which need not necessarily be granted to men. And that is what is now done by the laws of every State in the Union. It is to preserve those laws, beneficial and protective to women, that I offer this amendment.

What the term "rights" means, either in the text as reported to the Senate or in my amendment, is difficult to define. Look up the word "right" in any dictionary and one will find that it has as many different meanings as any other word in the book. But, whatever the meaning may be, it is intended to be the same in both instances.

Webster's dictionary quotes the words of Edmund Burke who said that "men have no right to what is not for their benefit." If that is sound doctrine, it follows that the law can define what is and what is not beneficial to men and to women. Since men and women are different, the laws applicable to them need not be identical.

The term "exemption" as used in my amendment recognizes that there are laws which grant to women freedom from liabilities and burdens to which men are subject.

I offer this amendment because there can be no question that it is the deliberate intention of those who sponsor this change in the Constitution completely to eradicate from the statute books every law in every State which confers any right, benefit, or exemption to women which is not also available to men. The courts lay great stress upon what was said by its proponents at the time of the enactment of any measure and consequently the following words spoken by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] in his address to the Senate on January 23 are of the highest importance:

> The amendment would not deprive the States of the power to classify for the protection of the health, safety, morals, and welfare of the community. In short, it simply assures that this classification shall not be based on the grounds of sex.

Later in his remarks the Senator from Iowa recognized that the question of interpreting and deciding just what the proposed constitutional amendment means would be before the courts when he said:

> Our problem, primarily, is to submit to the States an amendment that will establish the principle of equality of legal rights for all persons in America, regardless of whether they happened to be born male or female. Of course, if by judicial interpretation, after adoption of the proposed amendment, the trend to eliminate unhealthy working conditions for men is accelerated, then I am sure that few of us will regret such an interpretation.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the junior Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I ask the Senator if the majority of the legal experts who appeared before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary and also before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives did not feel that all the protective legislation passed by the various States for the benefit of women, as set forth in yesterday's RECORD beginning on page 828, would be in jeopardy?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no question that the best legal opinion is to that effect. I am very glad that the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] had the information relative to the laws of the several States beneficial to women printed in the RECORD, so as to clarify the issue.

The Senator from Iowa listed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a considerable number of national organizations which have endorsed the equal-rights amendment. A longer list prepared by the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] appears at page 758 of the RECORD. In his list are organizations which represent a very much larger number of people than the organizations named by the Senator from Iowa. I should like particularly to invite the attention of the Senate to some of the women's organizations named by the Senator from Tennessee as being on record in opposition to the proposed equal-rights amendment to the Constitution:

The National League of Women Voters; the National Council of Catholic Women; National Council of Jewish Women; National Council of Negro Women; National Women's Trade-Union League; Women's National Homeopathic Medical Fraternity; Women's Society for Christian Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church (eastern division); Young Women's Christian Associations of the United States of America, through its national board; the American Federation of Women's Auxiliaries of Labor, and the Congress of Women's Auxiliaries of the CIO.

The organizations listed by the junior Senator from Tennessee represent millions of men and women who are opposed to the enactment of the equal-rights amendment as reported to the Senate.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] at page 740 of the RECORD, quoted the 1944 national platforms of the two political parties, the Republican platform stating:

> We favor submission by Congress to the States of an amendment to the Constitution providing for equal rights for men and women.

The Democratic platform declared:

> We recommend to Congress the submission of a constitutional amendment on equal rights for women.

I was somewhat surprised to have my good friend the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] insist that these two political platforms endorse the exact words of the equal-rights amendment. That cannot be true, because the exact words of the pending amendment do not appear in either the Republican or the Democratic national platforms. What each of the two national conventions had in mind was an endorsement of the general idea of equal rights for women, without specifying just how that result would be attained. It is my contention that Senators can completely comply with the pledges made in the Democratic platform and the Republican platform if they vote for the equal-rights amendment with my amendment added to it. If both branches of the Congress approve of an amendment to the Contitution in that form, it will be submitted to the States for ratification, as requested by both of the great political parties.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. I ask the distinguished Senator from Arizona if it is not a fact that the sole purpose of his amendment is to protect women against the loss or impairment of rights, privileges, or benefits which they now enjoy under the law?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is exactly its intendment, and that is exactly what those had in mind who have examined into the question, as did the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and as did the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] in endorsing what the Senator from Illinois placed in the RECORD, namely, the long list of State laws beneficial to women, which they, as good lawyers, are convinced will be imperiled.

Mr. NEELY. I have received many letters and telegrams from labor organizations and some from women's associations and clubs urging me to oppose the pending resolution on the ground that if it should be adopted and the proposed constitutional amendment should be ratified, the women would thereby suffer losses infinitely greater than their gains.

In my opinion, the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona would eliminate every valid objection that has been voiced against this measure. Therefore, I shall support the able Senator's amendment, and if it be adopted, I shall vote for the resolution. To my unfeigned regret, if the amendment should be defeated, I shall be impelled to vote against the resolution. I am eager to increase women's blessings. I will not knowingly help to diminish those they now enjoy.

Mr. HAYDEN. Let me point out, if I may, in the brief time that remains——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has one more minute.

Mr. HAYDEN. I shall use an exemption as an illustration. In the laws of Arizona there is contained this provision:

> Any woman shall be exempt from jury duty by requesting her name be stricken from the jury list. Such request shall be in writing and placed on file with the county board of supervisors.

That means that an exemption has been granted to women in my State, so that if their family duties are thereby interfered with they cannot be placed upon a jury and locked in a jury room overnight. They may serve if they so desire. But under this equal-rights amendment, that privilege would also be extended to all men, and they could exercise their own judgment as to whether or not they would serve upon a jury.

In Arizona a provision of law specifies the minimum age at which young people may marry. It is fixed at 14 years of age for young men and 12 years of age for young women. Under this proposed equal-rights amendment, that minimum age must be either 12 or 14. Would it be scaled downward, so that the minimum marriage age for both young men and young women would be 12, or would it be scaled upward, so that the minimum age for both would be 14?

Mr. President, such questions are bound to be raised in the courts of every State and in the Supreme Court of the United States with respect to each and every law which grants a right, a benefit, or an exemption to women which men do not now have.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Arizona has expired.

The Senator from Iowa has 5 minutes remaining.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I yield the remainder of my time to the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER].

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, let me immediately disavow any intention on the part of the advocates of this proposal to abolish the distinctions of sex. The glory of each is a part of the lore of all literature.

But, Mr. President, what is proposed by the advocates of this constitutional amendment is that no longer may it be true in America that a woman can proclaim, with Euripides' wretched Medea, that—

> Of all things on earth that breed and grow,
> An herb most bruised is woman.

In short, Mr. President, the amendment proposes that at long last women shall be emancipated and placed before the law equal with the masculine portion of the population.

Mr. President, it cannot be proclaimed that what is the solemn profession of the two major parties of America, who receive, together, almost the entire electoral vote, is the expression of a minority group of this Nation. What is today proclaimed as the aspiration and proposal of this amendment is not only a national sentiment but an international expression.

In 1945 the United Nations Charter proclaimed the equal rights of men and women.

In 1948 the Universal Declaration of Human Rights proclaimed the equal rights of men and women.

In 1949 the draft International Covenant on Human Rights proclaimed the equal rights of all people to enjoy status before the law, regardless of sex.

In 1949 the draft Declaration on the Rights and Duties of States proclaimed the same rights for women and men.

So what we propose today is to accord women equal rights with men—to give women the full status of citizenship.

The amendment proposed by the able Senator from Arizona has a laudable purpose, Mr. President. The advocates of this joint resolution fear, however, that the technical and legal effect of that amendment might be to emasculate the effect of the proposed constitutional amendment itself, if it should finally be adopted. Therefore, they oppose that amendment, first, because it might make ineffectual what the States might ratify as an amendment to the Constitution; and, second, because, with all deference to the honored and able Senator from Arizona, we do not deem his amendment necessary. This constitutional amendment proposes to accord equal rights to women. It does not take away from the Congress or from the several legislatures the privilege and power of making justifiable classifications so as to protect women in proper cases.

Mr. President, men are equal before the law, yet not before the draft. Men have sometimes to serve in the front lines and sometimes to serve in other designated areas of warfare. All women may be drafted, as England did in the war, but England did not assign drafted women and drafted men to the same duties. Yet they were all equal in the necessity of response to the national call. But a difference in positions for them was a reasonable classification.

The courts are not blind to what everyone else knows. They will take judicial knowledge of the purpose behind this proposed constitutional amendment. They know the long struggle to give women equal dignity before the law, equal protection of the law, equal rights with men.

Mr. President, those who say now that only a few women want this equality of right are the same ones who a few years ago were saying that only a questionable part of the feminine population wanted the right to vote, that the good women of America wanted to stay at home and nurse the children.

Mr. President, speaking about children, I have not heard that any State law limiting the load which women can lift excludes them from lifting the children. If men are so anxious to help lighten the burdens on women, the men might be a little more generous in helping the women lift the babies and the things around the home.

So, Mr. President, we who are the advocates of this proposed amendment want to preserve every humanitarian statute which has been adopted in America for the benefit of women; but we think the time has been too long delayed when we shall actually, in legal status, lift women to the exalted pedestal on which we so often profess to place her, but upon which we all too seldom install her.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired. All time has expired.

Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the time has arrived for the Senate to vote on all amendments to the joint resolution and on the joint resolution itself.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hoey	Maybank
Anderson	Holland	Millikin
Benton	Humphrey	Mundt
Brewster	Hunt	Murray
Bricker	Ives	Neely
Byrd	Jenner	O'Conor
Cain	Johnson, Colo.	O'Mahoney
Chapman	Johnson, Tex.	Pepper
Connally	Johnston, S. C.	Robertson
Cordon	Kefauver	Russell
Donnell	Kem	Saltonstall
Douglas	Kerr	Smith, Maine
Downey	Kilgore	Smith, N. J.
Dworshak	Knowland	Sparkman
Eastland	Langer	Stennis
Ecton	Leahy	Taylor
Ferguson	Lehman	Thomas, Utah
Frear	Lodge	Thye
Fulbright	Long	Tobey
George	Lucas	Tydings
Gillette	McCarran	Vandenberg
Graham	McCarthy	Watkins
Green	McClellan	Wherry
Gurney	McFarland	Wiley
Hayden	McKellar	Williams
Hendrickson	McMahon	Young
Hickenlooper	Magnuson
Hill	Martin

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], which will be stated.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. For what purpose does the Senator from New York rise?

Mr. IVES. To ask if it will be possible for the resolution as it now is to be read before the decision on the amendment is made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has just directed the Secretary to read the amendment.

Mr. IVES. I thought the Chair had directed the clerk to read the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia offered an original amendment with a provision for 5 years, which has been modified to a provision for 7 years.

Mr. IVES. The Senator from New York asks that the joint resolution itself be read, so that we shall know how it stands, before we vote on amendments to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the original joint resolution and the proposed amendments, so as to show how it will read if it is amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

"The Congress and the several States shall have power, within their respective jurisdictions, to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within 7 years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress; and if so ratified, shall take effect upon the expiration of 1 year after the date of such ratification."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the third reading of the resolution——

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I have an amendment pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment was read for the information of the Senate. It has not actually been offered.

Mr. HAYDEN. I offer it, and I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona offers an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, between lines 4 and 5, it is proposed to insert the following:

The provisions of this article shall not be construed to impair any rights, benefits, or exemptions now or hereafter conferred by law upon persons of the female sex.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. WILEY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WITHERS] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] is absent on important public business.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] is unavoidably absent.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. DARBY] is absent by leave of the Senate.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] is absent on official business. If present and voting, the Senator from Oregon would vote "nay."

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] is absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting, the Senator from Kansas would vote "nay."

So Mr. HAYDEN'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment lettered "D," which I offered for myself, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], and the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state. Does the Senator wish the entire amendment read?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I should like to have the entire amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the resolving clause, together with the text, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

Whereas the economic, civil, social, and political progress of women has been burdened and impeded by discriminations arising in part from assumptions embedded in the common law; and

Whereas, notwithstanding notable legislative achievements in modern times, there remain in effect statutes, regulations, rules, and governmental practices which discriminate unfairly on the basis of sex; and

Whereas the authority and jurisdiction to remove existing burdens and impediments upon the status of women resides, to a great extent, in the legislatures of the several States; and

Whereas the present is an appropriate occasion to review the political, civil, economic, and social status of women for the purpose of modernizing applicable legal codes and administrative practices: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That it is the declared policy of the United States that in law and its administration no distinctions on the basis of sex shall be made except such as are reasonably justified by differences in physical structure, or by maternal function.

SEC. 2. (a) There is hereby established a Commission on the Legal Status of Women (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission") to be composed of 15 members appointed by the President, not more than 3 of whom shall be employees or officers of the executive branch of the Government. One of the members shall be designated by the President as Chairman. Vacancies in the membership of the Commission shall not impair its powers to exercise its functions and shall be filled in the same manner as in the case of original appointments. Members of the Commission shall receive their necessary travel expenses and a per diem allowance of $50 in lieu of subsistence.

(b) The Commission is authorized without regard to the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to employ and fix the compensation of such officers and employees as it deems necessary for the performance of its functions and to use voluntary and uncompensated personnel. The Commission may make such expenditures as may be necessary for the performance of its functions. The Commission may, with the consent of the department, independent establishment, or agency, or authority concerned (Federal or State), utilize their facilities, services, and personnel. The Commission may in cooperation with private agencies utilize their facilities, services, and information with or without compensation therefor.

(c) The Commission shall make a full and complete study, investigation, and review of the economic, civil, social, and political status of women, and the nature and extent of discriminations based on sex throughout the United States, its Territories, and possessions. In carrying out its study and investigation, the Commission is further authorized to make such investigations and studies of the regulations, rules, practices, procedures, and files of all departments, independent agencies and establishments, and all other agencies of the United States in the executive branch of the Government as is necessary for the performance of its functions.

(d) Prior to March 1, 1951, the Commission shall submit to the President its final report which shall include recommendations for such legislation as may be necessary to cause the laws of the United States and their administration to conform with the policy set forth in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 3. Within 30 days after its receipt, the President shall transmit the report and recommendations of the Commission to the Congress, together with his own recommendations, as to any further action by Congress which may be necessary to cause the laws of the United States and their administration to conform with the policy set forth in section 1 of this act, and when such report of the President is so transmitted, the Commission and all authority, powers, and duties conferred upon it in this act, shall terminate.

SEC. 4. (a) Insofar as may be authorized by existing law, every department, independent agency, or establishment, and all other agencies of the United States in the executive branch of the Government—

(1) shall cause all regulations and rules issued or practice engaged in by them to conform to the policy set forth in section 1 of this act; and

(2) shall modify, amend, repeal, or eliminate such regulations, rules, or practices as may not be in conformity with the policy set forth in section 1 of this act.

(b) After complying with the provisions of subsection (a) every such department, independent agency and establishment, and such other agencies shall inform the Commission prior to November 1, 1951, of the extent to which its regulations, rules, and practices continue to embody distinctions on the basis of sex and the statutory or other justification therefor.

SEC. 5. The legislative bodies of the several States and their political subdivisions are urged to declare, by resolution or other appropriate form of procedure, the adoption of a legislative policy in conformity with the policy of the United States as expressed in section 1 of this act, to review legislation, regulations, ordinances, and governmental practices, and to take such further action, including, but without limitation, passage of legislation, as will insure that law and its administration within their respective jurisdictions will be in conformity with such policy. The President is directed to transmit a copy of this act and the report of the Commission to the executive head of the several States, Territories, and possessions.

SEC. 6. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Change the joint resolution in form to that of a bill, with the following number, S. ——, and in lieu of the title of the joint resolution insert the following: "A bill to provide for the investigation of discriminations against women on the basis of sex, to establish policies for the removal of such discriminations, and for other purposes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER].

Mr. GILLETTE rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For what purpose does the Senator from Iowa rise?

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa rises for the purpose of making a point of order against the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, the amendment by way of a substitute is not in order, because even without the unanimous-consent agreement under which the Senate is operating, it would change entirely the character of the proposal which is before the Senate. The measure which is before the Senate is a functional measure; it is not legislation. It is a measure which is designed to lay before the States, by a two-thirds vote, the privilege of passing on whether the proposed amendment shall become part of the Constitution. If such an amendment by way of a substitute were adopted it would become legislation requiring a majority vote for its passage. It would have to go to the White House for the signature of the President, or be vetoed by him, and it could be passed over the veto of the President by the requisite number of votes of this body.

The joint resolution does not have to go to the White House. After the two Houses have acted on it the function of the Congress is complete. It cannot be returned to the Congress for consideration. The proposed amendment by way of a substitute entirely changes the character of the measure which is before the Senate.

Even if that were not true, as we are operating under the rule of germaneness, I trust the Chair will bear with me in calling attention to the precedents on germaneness and reading the following:

The mere fact that an amendment proposes to attain the same end sought to be attained by the bill to which offered does not render it germane.

One of the functions of the rule requiring germaneness is to preclude consideration of legislation which has not been considered in committee and for this reason the rule should be invoked with particular strictness against amendments proposing substitutes for an entire bill.

Mr. President, there are precedents whereby the character of a joint resolution has been changed to that of a bill by changing the preliminary language, but that simply changed the legislative character of it, and both the joint resolution and the bill were subject to the signature of the President or his veto, and if vetoed, further action by the Congress.

The proposal we have before us is sui generis, if I may use the term, and cannot be changed, in the opinion of the Senator from Iowa, by offering a measure attempting to make it legislation of an entirely different character and entirely not germane to the subject before the Senate.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator briefly on the point of order, but not upon the merits of the proposal.

Mr. HAYDEN. I was aware that the junior Senator from Tennessee desired to offer his substitute. I advised him that it could be done, having in mind that when a poll-tax bill was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, proposing a legislative enactment on the subject, I offered a substitute the text of which was submitted in a minority report to the Senate, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill which had passed the House of Representatives and to substitute therefor provision for a constitutional amendment. I was advised by the Parliamentarian that a constitutional amendment could be submitted in the form of a bill as well as in the form of a joint resolution, and that it was proper to do so. So I submitted a proposed constitutional amendment dealing with the same subject matter as a substitute for the entire poll-tax bill. I am sure that the junior Senator from Tennessee is in order in offering his substitute.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, on the question of germaneness, I think the situation we have before us is parallel to the situation in connection with the question raised in the matter of the poll-tax bill. In one case a bill was presented, and as a substitute a joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment was ruled to be in order. They both dealt with the same subject matter. In this case it is the other way around. It is my understanding, from consulting with the Parliamentarian, that this question has been ruled on on other occasions, and that a bill can be offered as a substitute for a joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment, just as a resolution proposing a constitutional amendment can be offered as a substitute for a bill. The only difference is in the number or percentage of votes required for passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to rule.

On the question of germaneness, which is governed by the unanimous-consent agreement, the Chair thinks that the substitute is germane. It deals with the same subject, though in a little different way.

On the question of whether an amendment to the Constitution must be submitted in the form of a joint resolution or in the form of a bill, the only requirement of the Constitution is that the question shall be submitted by a two-thirds vote. It does not require that it be done by joint resolution. It may be done in the form of a bill. Therefore, the Chair holds that, since the amendment offered is a substitute for a joint resolution, in the form of a bill, the point of order is not sustained.

The Chair has looked into the matter, anticipating that the question might be raised, as it has been a number of times in the past, and the Chair has found it to be held that a bill before the Senate may be amended to make it a joint resolution. In one case a joint resolution was before the Senate, and the Presiding Officer held that it could be changed to a bill by an amendment or a substitute. Therefore, the Chair is constrained to hold——

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Chair permit an inquiry before the announcement of the decision?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. PEPPER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator from Florida inferred from the remarks of the distinguished Vice President that he was proceeding on the assumption that the proposal of the Senator from Tennessee was a constitutional amendment to be proposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no; the Chair is not assuming that. By its very terms it is a bill.

Mr. PEPPER. It is only legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It becomes legislation, and is not a constitutional amendment. It can be adopted by a majority vote, whereas if it proposed a constitutional amendment it would have to be adopted by a two-thirds vote.

The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER].

Mr. KEFAUVER and other Senators asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WITHERS] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] is absent on important public business.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] is unavoidably absent.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. DARBY] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] are absent by leave of the Senate.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], who is absent on official business, is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], who is absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting, the Senator from Oregon would vote "yea," and the Senator from Kansas would vote "nay."

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE] is absent on official business. If present and voting, the Senator from Nevada would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 65, as follows:

So Mr. KEFAUVER's amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is open to further amendment. If there be no amendment to be offered, the question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. LANGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WITHERS] are absent on official business.

MEMBER OF JOINT COMMITTEE OF CONGRESS ON THE LIBRARY

Mr. HAYDEN, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 220), which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That Mr. HENDRICKSON, of New Jersey, be, and he is hereby, elected a member on the part of the Senate of the Joint Committee of Congress on the Library, vice Mr. IVES, of New York.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Claude H. Broach and sundry other persons for appointment in the United States Coast Guard; and Ernest B. Lewey and sundry other employees for appointment in the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

By Mr. HUNT, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

James E. Friend, of Texas, to be Assistant Director of Locomotive Inspection, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MAYBANK:

S. 2923. A bill to authorize the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to acquire or construct, with its own funds, a building within the District of Columbia suitable for the Corporation; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. KILGORE:

S. 2924. A bill to establish for individuals who served in the armed forces during World War II a presumption of service-connected disability in the case of tuberculosis existing within 3 years after discharge from such forces; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

By Mr. NEELY:

S. 2925. A bill to incorporate the Girl Scouts of the United States of America, and for other purposes; and

S. 2926 (by request). A bill for the relief of Mr. and Mrs. Eugen Jose Singer; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CHAPMAN:

S. 2927. A bill for the relief of Edmon Burgher; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. LANGER:

S. 2928. A bill to authorize the Postmaster General to prescribe a uniform dress for groups of postal employees and to extend existing penal provisions covering unauthorized wearing of uniforms to these groups; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S. 2929. A bill to amend section 32 of the Trading With the Enemy Act of 1917, as amended, so as to permit the return under such section of property which an alien acquired, by gift, devise, bequest, or inheritance, from an American citizen; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina:

S. 2930. A bill to amend and clarify the District of Columbia Teachers' Leave Act of 1949, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT—AMENDMENT

Mr. LANGER submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF HEARINGS RELATING TO FEDERAL FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICE ACT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate House Concurrent Resolution 152, which was read by the Chief Clerk, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That, in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Education and Labor, House of Representatives, be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to have printed for its use 1,000 additional copies of the hearings held before a special subcommittee of said committee relative to the Federal Fair Employment Practice Act.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House concurrent resolution.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the Senator state what is proposed to be done by adoption of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senate would extend a courtesy to the House by allowing a House committee to have some additional copies of hearings printed.

Mr. WHERRY. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The motion was agreed to.

THE COAL-MINE SITUATION—LETTER FROM JOHN L. LEWIS

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, on behalf of, and acting for, my colleague, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MARTIN], I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD, at this point in my remarks, a letter which has been received by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1950.

Hon. EDWARD MARTIN,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MARTIN: Your letter reached me today after you introduced it into the Senate RECORD yesterday.

I assume your letter refers to the situation in western Pennsylvania, where the principal mines affected are those owned by the United States Steel Corp. and the Pittsburgh Consolidation Coal Co., owned by M. A. Hanna & Co. I assume also, that you read the financial reports, and are aware that these two corporations are earning very large dividends and could afford to make an honorable contract with the mine workers They have not done so, and they refuse to do so.

Approximately 1,600 coal companies, producing 35,000,000 tons of coal annually, have executed a contract with the United Mine Workers of America, and are working 5 and many of them 6 days per week. The contract that they have signed merely adds about 15½ cents per ton to their previous cost of production after tax deductions. Surely, Senator, this is not too much for the United States Steel and M. A. Hanna to pay, either out of their present earnings or from the extra coal prices which they are now charging the public. If your sympathy for the coal miners, Senator, is as deep as you profess, and I am sure that it is, why not raise your eloquent voice to urge these powerful corporate interests to abate their warfare against the mine workers and their union, and execute a wage contract on the same basis as other operators have done?

Each of these corporate interests receive many favors from Government. Each of them will look for more. M. A. Hanna & Co. wants to borrow $100,000,000 from the Import and Export Bank to exploit their Labrador iron holdings. They also wish the Government to develop the St. Lawrence waterway to take care of water shipment of their iron from Labrador to the steel mills contiguous to the Great Lakes. You are a Senator and know about these things. Why not approach them in a practical way? The mine workers have no concern with your sympathy for them. They would prefer that you exercise your great talents to secure for them some modicum of justice in their dealings with the corporations which exploit them.

If the mood comes upon you to introduce this letter in the Senate RECORD in supplementation to your previous remarks, I shall indeed have no objections.

In the meantime, I reciprocate your kind respects, and believe me, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. LEWIS.

COAL SUPPLIES IN MARYLAND

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, as indicative of the situation existing in many parts of Maryland with regard to coal supplies, I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. S. Norman Holland, one of the proprietors of Pocahontas, Inc., Salisbury, Md.

This letter would seem to point up the dangers that threaten not only our own State but many of the States of the Union if the coal situation is permitted to deteriorate further.

It is a matter of moment to all our people everywhere that demands the most intelligent handling possible. I ask unanimous consent that the letter be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POCAHONTAS, INC.,
Salisbury, Md., January 17, 1950.

The Honorable HERBERT O'CONOR,
Senator from Maryland,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: It seems that the big problem of our country today is a fuel shortage and without question this is true (regardless of what our President says about the shortage not being acute). I would like to ask him today just how bad it has to get to come to that stage.

We have been in the wholesale and retail coal business for 24 years and serve a big share of the Eastern Shore of Maryland. Never before, regardless of the two wars, has there been anything like this shortage. While I am writing this letter, four telephones in our office are ringing and not a pound of coal in our yard which covers about 2 acres of ground, except one pile of No. 3 anthracite which will be gone overnight. Our principal sales are of bituminous coals. We have contracts for all of the county schools, different hospitals, and a big share of the poultry industry which, as you know, is using a great part of the coal today. We are having to say "No" all day and do not know when more will be rolling. We are continuously talking to the mines and getting the answer, "Sorry, but no coal mined today." I have talked to many other coal people, not only in Maryland but in other States, and I find the same thing. I think it is high time for you and all the officials to make a special effort overnight to do something about this shortage if you expect to save a lot of people from freezing in case of a cold storm which we have been very fortunate not to have up to now. I cannot express in words just how bad it is. We retail coal men over this whole land will be out of business if something doesn't happen and happen soon. As a Senator of Maryland, I am pleading to you to make this appeal immediately.

If there is anything I can do please call on me at any time to help in this crisis.

Sincerely,

S. NORMAN HOLLAND.

REMARKS ON THE OCCASION OF THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1949 BECOMING EFFECTIVE

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, today the amendments which Congress adopted to the Fair Labor Standards Act went into force. I have prepared a statement relating to those amendments. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR ELBERT D. THOMAS, CHAIRMAN, SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE, ON THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1949

Mr. President, it is the Senate's time-honored custom—one which I believe should be and hope will be, maintained—of noting past events of significance in the history of our Republic. I take the occasion today to call to the attention of the Senate an event that did not occur long ago, but one which is occurring today. It, too, however, is one of considerable significance to the Nation, and particularly to those of our people whose needs are great but whose voices are often lost amidst the cries of the many organized and highly vocal groups in our society.

Today the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1949 became effective. This legislation is, I believe, the first major piece of legislation for the welfare of our wage-earning population to become effective in more than a decade.

There is no need for me to discuss in detail the beneficial effects which the provisions of this act will have. They were discussed at length here on the floor of the Senate during the debates on the measure in the closing days of the last session. Only the die-hard opponents of effective wage-hour legislation—men more concerned with their privileged position rather than with the health and vitality of our economy—would dare to deny that we have taken, through this legislation, great strides forward in eradicating the evils of the sweatshop and of child labor. Who can foretell the untold benefits accruing to the youth of our Nation through the effective prohibition, now in the law by virtue of these amendments, against the employment of oppressive child labor in interstate industry and commerce? Who can fully foretell the "chain reaction" benefits accruing to the tradesmen and farmers throughout our country as a result of fatter pay envelopes at the end of the week for a million and a half of our industrial workers?

Our highly complex interrelated industrial system is the generator of our strength and vitality, and the mechanism which has enabled us to attain world leadership. It is the most valuable machine which the democratic world possesses, and one which we must constantly maintain, repair, and improve. By these amendments to the wage-and-hour law, we have replaced worn-out parts with new and improved ones. Today the motor's hum sounds better, and it is a hum which says, at least to me, that we live in a healthier and stronger land.

Healthier and stronger internally because the fruits of our technology are being more widely distributed so that we may have a better housed, fed, and clothed citizenry. Healthier and stronger externally because we give to the world another concrete demonstration of how an expanding standard of living can be achieved through the democratic process.

I am humbly grateful that I was able to take part in this effort to provide a better life for all our people, and I congratulate the Members of this body and of the House of Representatives whose devotion to the general welfare of our Nation made possible the developments which are occurring today.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, as Senators know, 1 minute after midnight this morning the minimum-wage-law amendments went into effect. It had been my purpose to make a comment on that legislation, the essential character of it, and what it meant to the Nation and to my State of Florida. In order to keep from trespassing upon the time of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that a statement which I have prepared, and, as I have said, which I expected to deliver, together with an additional presentation dealing with the effect of the new minimum-wage law on Florida, may be printed in full in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, Mr. PEPPER's statement and the memorandum showing the effect of the new minimum-wage law on the State of Florida were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CLAUDE PEPPER

Mr. President, at 1 minute after midnight this morning, the amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act which were passed in the closing days of the first session of this Congress went into effect. This is one of the great achievements of the Eighty-first Congress for the welfare of our working men and women and the Nation.

These amendments have raised the legal minimum wage from 40 to 75 cents an hour. The 1,500,000 workers covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act, who were getting less than 75 cents an hour yesterday, did not have the protection under the law which they needed. These 1,500,000 working people are now getting a fair wage which is more nearly in line with our present national income.

The raise in the minimum wage to 75 cents an hour will result in their having $300,000,000 more a year in purchasing power. Fifty thousand wage earners in Florida, who will also benefit from this increase, will receive over $10,000,000 more a year in wages. Most of the increases will range from 5 to 15 cents an hour.

This will mean more milk for children of our working people and a general improvement in the diets of their families, a chance to secure better housing, and to provide for their education and general well-being. The raise in the minimum wage will mean that everywhere in the Nation—stores in every community will have more business. It means higher profits for businessmen.

The 22,000,000 employees who are now covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act, and who are now receiving more than 75 cents an hour, will benefit by the improvement of the legal floor under their wages.

The 630,000 business establishments in the United States, which are now covered by the act will be relieved from the unfair competition of employers who pay low wages.

The amendments greatly extend the prohibition against oppressive child labor. They virtually outlaw a sweat-shop and drive out the unscrupulous employers who use child labor to undermine the fair labor standards and working conditions of conscientious and efficient manufacturers and businessmen.

Prior to the passage of the amendments the law sought to prevent oppressive child labor in an indirect way by prohibiting the shipment of goods in interstate commerce if oppressive child labor had been employed in the establishment where such goods were manufactured during the 30 days before they were shipped. Under the amendments effective today, oppressive child labor is directly prohibited in the production of goods for commerce. For the first time also the act prohibits the employment of child labor in commerce thus giving the protection of the law to young people in such interstate activities as transportation, communications, and warehousing.

The new law gives the Wage and Hour Administrator certain powers which will improve the administration and result in better enforcement. It gives him authority to protect the wage standards set in the law through controls over manufacturing activities moving into the homes of our people.

Mr. President, the amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act is just one of the many efforts of the Eighty-first Congress to meet the unfilled needs of our people. These amendments will become a great stabilizing force in our economy and will contribute to the continuation of prosperity in the Nation.

EFFECT OF THE NEW MINIMUM-WAGE LAW ON FLORIDA

1. There are approximately 189,000 employees in Florida to whom the minimum-wage provision of the act applies.

2. There are about 8,900 establishments in Florida with employees to whom the minimum-wage provision applies.

3. About 50,000 of the 189,000 covered employees are being paid less than 75 cents an hour.

4. In the fiscal year 1949 investigations were carried on by the Divisions in 1948 establishments with employees covered by the law. In 336 of these establishments underpayments to 5,297 employees were found, including 466 who had been underpaid on the 40-cent-an-hour minimum wage. (The other employees were owed back wages for overtime.) The total amount of back wages due under the law was $272,866. Of this amount $80,988 was actually paid to the employees. Under the fair-labor standards amendments of 1949, section 16 (c) authorizes the Administrator to supervise the payment of back wages found due, and to sue for the money in court at the request of the employee under certain conditions. It is expected that this amendment to the law will correct the situation in which less than one-third of the money found due employees under the law is actually paid to them.

5. In the fiscal year 1949, there were 121 Government purchase contracts awarded to Florida firms, amounting to $8,042,694 in value. Only a small part of these contracts were subject to recent wage determinations under the Public Contracts Act. However, the Divisions are now starting on greatly accelerated wage determinations in line with the prevailing minimum wages in these industries as they are today, and to establish wage determinations in additional industries where such action is needed. These wage determinations may be considerably higher than 75 cents; there is no statutory ceiling, and the rate is set at the figure shown by the facts to be the present prevailing minimum in the industry.

6. While fish canning is at present a small industry in Florida (2 establishments as far as we know), the amendment bringing employees of fish and seafood canneries under the minimum wage will immediately afford protection to the pay of these workers, and any further growth in this industry will be on the sound basis of decent minimum-pay standards for the workers involved.

ATTITUDE OF PEOPLE OF FORMOSA

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an article by Clyde Farnsworth, out of Taipeh, Formosa, which is self-explanatory.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of January 20, 1950]

CORRESPONDENT FINDS FORMOSANS FULL OF FIGHT

(By Clyde Farnsworth)

TAIPEH, FORMOSA, January 20.—Even without American aid to the Chinese Nationalists, Formosa would be no push-over for the Communists.

That's one of the first impressions you get after landing at this refugee capital of the Chinese Government. And there's something unusual here for Nationalist China—enthusiasm of a local population for its own defense.

Mme. Chiang Kai-shek, arriving here yesterday, ran into widespread demonstrations not of welcome to her (her "homecoming" was quiet and unostentatious) but rather of Formosan support for the Nationalist Government's first Formosa conscription campaign. It's supposed to add 35,000 men to the island's defense forces.

VOLUNTEER

The first 1950 quota—4,500 by January 15—is likely to be oversubscribed. Amazed officials tell of Formosans who failed to make the conscription lists petitioning to be accepted as volunteers. For a Chinese conscription program this is unheard of. The Chinese conscript too often has been a man who has to be peeled of his civvies, but quick, to keep him from going back home at the first chance.

But at Taipeh and at Keelung and other cities where Formosans as well as mainland Chinese have been given a chance to join in their own defense, the conscripts are being wined and dined by their neighbors and district leaders. Girl students place flowers around the conscripts' necks and the bands play on.

Considering the way Washington has been pouring cold water on Formosa's chances of American help, or even of unassisted survival against international communism, it's a wonder that a single string of firecrackers was touched off here in the draft campaign, or that a single papier mâché dragon danced in the streets.

There has been no black-out here on the bad news from Washington, but Formosa's enthusiasm is undampened. If the United States were still looking for will to fight among the Chinese, it could find plenty here.

ASSAULTS REPULSED

Troops graduating from Gen. Sun Li-jen's 5-months' training centers as well as old-line troops have distinguished themselves in recent months in halting amphibious assaults on Kingmen Island and at Tengpu in the Chusan Islands.

General Sun, a distinguished alumnus of Virginia Military Institute, commands the ground forces for defense of Formosa. One of his aides said last night: "Of one thing we are certain—our troops will fight."

A similar rebirth of spirit is reported among the navy and air force troops upon whom much of Formosa's fate may depend. In fact, the defense potentialities of Formosa for the next few months, at least, are so high that the Communists probably will postpone any direct assault.

It would be wiser for them to let the Nationalist Government dangle here and count upon its isolation by western powers and the economic burden of maintaining Formosa as an armed camp to sap Nationalist strength.

Meanwhile the Reds can gobble up Hainan and toy with French Indochina.

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS TO GEN. DOUGLAS MACARTHUR AND INVITATION TO HIM TO ADDRESS A JOINT SESSION OF SENATE AND HOUSE ON FAR EASTERN CRISIS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, tomorrow, January 26, 1950, marks the seventieth birthday of one of the greatest American military leaders and statesmen of our times. I refer, of course, to Gen. Douglas MacArthur, who, while he was born in the State of Arkansas, where his father was serving, has always considered Milwaukee as his legal residence.

Wisconsin, proud of the MacArthur family's deep roots in her soil, has always rightly claimed a share of the honor of being Douglas MacArthur's native State.

I suggest that the best birthday tribute that we in the Congress can pay to General MacArthur is twofold:

WE MUST LIFT IRON CURTAIN FROM FAR EAST

First. By securing all of the facts regarding General MacArthur's recommendations to the Joint Chiefs of Staff for defense of besieged Formosa, as well as regarding our general position in the Far East. Then, having secured those full facts, it is up to us in the Congress to weigh his able recommendations most carefully and to take such immediate steps as are best calculated to stop the victorious march of communism throughout Asia.

There has been a shocking iron curtain set up between Douglas MacArthur and the American people, through no fault of the general. While no Senator would ask that military security regulations be violated, it is quite clear that neither Congress nor the people have been given the necessary facts on the true situation, as reported by General MacArthur, in the explosive Far East.

WE NEED OPEN COVENANTS OPENLY ARRIVED AT

I am not criticizing any single individual or invading the jurisdiction of the executive branch when I say that, time and time again, the shop-worn excuse of military security has been used as a cloak over diplomatic blunders. What is there about foreign policy that is so hard to comprehend or so secret that it must be kept from the intelligent American people? The time is long overdue for the present administration to follow the principle of Woodrow Wilson of open covenants openly arrived at.

MAC ARTHUR SHOULD ADDRESS JOINT SESSION

Second. The second best way for us to send birthday greetings to General MacArthur is for my colleagues and myself to indicate in no uncertain terms that it is our earnest desire that General MacArthur return to the United States to address a joint session of Congress on the crisis in the Far East. I do not suggest an immediate date for such a return, because I believe that the general himself is best able to judge when the situation in troubled Japan would permit his leaving as supreme commander of the Allied occupation forces.

On several occasions, various committees of the Congress have invited the general to testify before them on the deteriorating situation in Asia. But each time the general has respectfully declined, in order that he might remain on hand at his post, so as to continue to steer the Japanese ship of state along peaceful, democratic channels. I am hoping, however, that the hero of Bataan will feel that the time is near for him to return, at long last, to the shores of the country that he has served so well for so long.

No single individual in the Far East or at a Pentagon or State Department desk has a better grasp and understanding of all that is necessary to stop the triumphant march of communism in the Far East.

I do not believe that General MacArthur should merely testify before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee or before the House Foreign Affairs Committee or a joint meeting of those committees. On the contrary, I believe that his words would be of more than enough significance to justify a special joint session of the Senate and House and a broadcast to all the world. We have on occasion met to hear many foreign dignitaries, and I feel that it is only fair and wise that the 531 Members of the Senate and House assemble together to hear the words of this great American spoken from his own lips without iron-curtain censorship.

DOUGLAS MAC ARTHUR'S FAMILY ROOTS

I would not want this opportunity to pass without saying just a word about his magnificent record. As I have indicated, we in Wisconsin are proud to share him as a native son. His Scottish-born grandfather, Arthur MacArthur, arrived in Milwaukee 101 years ago, in 1849, and later became city attorney. He was elected lieutenant governor, and thereafter served briefly as governor in 1856. His son, in turn, Arthur MacArthur, Douglas' father, joined a Wisconsin Civil War regiment at 17, and won the title of "The Boy Colonel of the West," being awarded a Congressional Medal of Honor. At the age of 18, while his father was fulfilling a military mission in the Philippines, Douglas and his mother moved to the Plankinton House in Milwaukee. He performed engineering duty in Milwaukee during his early professional years.

MAC ARTHUR'S EPIC MILITARY ACHIEVEMENTS

Few military records in the annals of American warfare have been more crowned with honors than is that of General MacArthur. During the First World War he was wounded twice, decorated 13 times, and cited 7 additional times for extreme bravery under fire. In the Second World War, he won, among other honors, 17 American decorations and 23 decorations from foreign countries. He was awarded the thanks of the Congress, and received many honorary degrees, including that of the University of Wisconsin. His magnificent return to the Philippines is one of the most glorious chapters in American history. His epic achievements in the Pacific, although receiving a minimum of military aid, equipment, and personnel, his victories gained with a minimum of casualties, are the sort of military record of which every branch of our service is proud.

He was the youngest man ever to hold the position of Superintendent of West Point. Incidentally, his own 4-year scholastic average while a student at West Point was the highest in 25 years, and still tops the records. In World War I he was the youngest division commander in the United States Army. He was the youngest man ever to hold a position as Chief of Staff. He was rated by Secretary of War Newton D. Baker as America's best World War I front-line general. He emerged from retirement in 1937 to become the only field marshal in United States Army annals. At the expiration of his 4-year term as Chief of Staff, precedent was broken when he was reappointed.

CONCLUSION

Perhaps his greatest of all achievements has been his amazing record of occupying Japan and then steering that country's reconstruction. No individual, least of all Douglas MacArthur, would claim that all of Japan's problems are solved or that the job is done in Japan. On the contrary, we still have a tremendous task there, particularly now that it has been complicated by the Red conquest of China and the Red advances throughout much of southeast Asia. It is in the Orient that, paradoxically enough, the future of western civilization may be decided. We need Douglas MacArthur's judgment, therefore.

The best tribute we can pay to this great American is not by our words, but, rather, by the deeds we perform in line with his spirit and his recommendations.

NATIONAL CHILDREN'S DENTAL HEALTH DAY

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, there is on the calendar House Joint Resolution 184, Calendar No. 1242, which would authorize the President of the United States to proclaim February 6, 1950, as National Children's Dental Health Day. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 184) authorizing the President of the United States of America to proclaim February 6, 1950, as National Children's Dental Health Day, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized", to strike out "and directed."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Is there any appropriation connected with the joint resolution?

Mr. LUCAS. There is no appropriation connected with it. The joint resolution was reported unanimously from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHERRY. The purpose of the joint resolution is simply to set aside a day for the purposes indicated in the measure.

Mr. LUCAS. Precisely so.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The joint resolution does not establish a legal holiday?

Mr. LUCAS. It does not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the joint resolution.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 184) was read the third time and passed.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 2, Calendar No. 601, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President; doing away with the electoral college.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of and debate upon Senate Joint Resolution 2, I should like to make an announcement. On yesterday I announced that the Senate would take up a bill in which the two Senators from Arizona and the two Senators from California are very much interested, following the disposition of the joint resolution I have just moved be considered by the Senate. I had temporarily forgotten that I had agreed with the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] that he should have at least 10 days' or 2 weeks' notice before the Senate considered that bill. The bill to which I have reference is Senate bill 75, Calendar No. 839, authorizing the construction, operation, and maintenance of a dam and incidental works in the main stream of the Colorado River at Bridge Canyon, together with certain appurtenant dams and canals, and for other purposes. I have talked with the Senators who are particularly interested in the bill, and I have agreed that the Senate will not take up that measure until a week from the coming Monday. I wanted the Senate to know that. As to what will follow consideration of the joint resolution now about to be considered I am not certain. I must call a meeting of the policy committee to make that determination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 2, Calendar No. 601.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to make a presentation concerning Senate Joint Resolution 2, which proposes an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, abolishing the electoral college and providing for the counting of the electoral vote for President and Vice President in proportion to the popular vote.

My remarks will, first of all, summarize the provisions of the proposed amendment; second, I shall outline the defects in the present system; third, I shall give the advantages of the proposed system; and, finally, I shall discuss the objections which have been made to this proposal, and I shall endeavor to rebut them.

Of course, I shall be glad to yield for questions.

Mr. President, Senate Joint Resolution 2 is similar to Senate Joint Resolution 200, of the Eightieth Congress, which was reported favorably by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate on May 3, 1948. It was reintroduced in 1949 under the sponsorship of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HOEY], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS], and myself. It is identical with House Joint Resolution 2, which was favorably acted upon by the House Committee on the Judiciary on April 7, 1949.

Extensive hearings have been held on the joint resolution. The hearings have been printed, and copies are on the desk of each Senator. I hope all Senators will read the hearings, because they are a gold mine of information on this subject.

In addition to the Senators who appeared in support of the proposal, statements were filed by students of the problem. In particular, there was an endorsement by a very distinguished institution whose authority in the field of public questions is unchallenged. I refer to the Brookings Institution. There was one witness who appeared in opposition.

Mr. President, I shall insert in the RECORD a detailed analysis, sentence by sentence, of the provisions of the proposed constitutional amendment. But let me say now that it does three things, principally:

First, it abolishes entirely the office of Presidential elector. The electoral vote per State, which is equal to the total number of Representatives and Senators, is retained, but purely as an automatic counting device.

Second, it eliminates any possibility that an election may be thrown into the House of Representatives—a possibility which, as Senators know, was a very real one in connection with the 1948 election.

Third, it does away with the so-called unit-rule system of counting electoral votes. Under the existing system, the candidate receiving a plurality of the popular vote in any given State is credited with all the electoral votes of that State, regardless of how infinitesimal the plurality. Under the proposed system, the electoral votes in each State are automatically divided among the candidates in direct proportion to the popular vote.

Let me illustrate: Let us assume that a certain State has 12 electoral votes. Of the 2,400,000 popular votes cast in that State, R, the Republican, received 1,600,000. D, the Democrat, received 600,000. T, the third party candidate, received 200,000. Under the present system, all of the State's 12 electoral votes would go to R. Under the proposed system, the electoral vote would be divided in proportion to the popular vote as follows: Eight electoral votes for R; three electoral votes for D; and one electoral vote for T.

The electoral votes are computed to three decimal places. In the very remote, but mathematically possible, event of a tie, it is provided that the candidate receiving the most number of popular votes wins the election.

The electoral votes which each candidate receives, therefore, represent his proportional strength in the State. These votes are then taken and added to the electoral votes received in all the other States. The candidate having the greatest number of electoral votes wins the Presidency. Votes for Vice President are counted in precisely the same manner.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

So much for a summary of the proposal. Now let me give a brief historical background.

Since January 6, 1797, when Representative William L. Smith, of South Carolina, offered in Congress the first constitutional amendment proposing reform of our procedure for electing the President, hardly a session of Congress has passed without the introduction of one or more resolutions of this character. All these proposals recognized, as does the reform embodied in Senate Joint Resolution 2, that the so-called electoral-college system has never functioned as contemplated by the framers of the Constitution.

The delegates to the Constitutional Convention were, for the most part, definitely opposed to electing the President by direct popular vote. They seemed to agree with George Mason, of Virginia, that "it were as unnatural to refer the choice of a proper character for Chief Magistrate to the people, as it would be to refer a trial of colors to a blind man." The delegates distrusted the ability of the average citizen of that day to decide questions of such great gravity. Moreover, the discussions of the Convention reveal that the delegates did not believe that it was possible for a voter in one State to know anything about the ability or character of public men in the other States scattered along our 1,500-mile shore line. In addition, those representing the smaller States believed that popular election would somehow increase the power and prestige of the more heavily populated States.

These considerations, after probably the most prolonged debate of the Convention, led to adoption of the indirect method of electing the President. Under this plan, the States were to select well-informed public men who were to look the field over and elect a President and Vice President. In selecting these electors, each State was left free to use any procedure it might see fit to adopt—direct popular election of the electors on a general, blanket ticket (the procedure used in all States today); or by single member districts; or by the vote of the legislature itself (a procedure which all the States had abandoned by 1860).

The electors so selected by each State should meet, it was decided, on a given date at a designated place within the State and vote by ballot for two persons. They were required to send a list of all persons voted for and the number of votes for each, to the President of the Senate, where, on a date fixed by law, they were to be opened in the presence of the two Houses, and the vote counted. The person having the largest number of votes was to be declared President if such number were a majority of all the votes cast. The runner-up should be declared Vice President, whether he had a majority or not. This was later modified by the twelfth amendment.

This is the system which, modified by the twelfth amendment, has continued in effect up to the present time. It has retained the original form, even though all reason for this form has long since disappeared. The historian, Arthur M. Schlesinger, recently wrote in his book, Paths to the Present:

> What demoted the electoral college from a deliberative body to a puppet show was the rise of political parties. As people began taking sides on public questions they were unwilling to leave the crucial choice of the Chief Executive to a sort of lottery. Instead, each party publicly announced its slate of electors and the candidate they would support. This usurpation of the electors' functions, though peaceably achieved, amounted to a coup d'état. It was an amendment of the written Constitution by the unwritten Constitution. The electors, while retaining the legal status of independence, became henceforth hardly more than men in livery taking orders from their parties.

Individual Members of Congress, of course, have always been mindful of the fact that this indirect method of electing the President stood in need of modernization. As stated before, the first legislative proposal for reform came in 1797, only 10 years after the Constitutional Convention itself. In the 50-year period between 1889 and 1947, 123 amendment proposals relating to the election of the President were introduced in Congress. Prior to that time, proponents of the twelfth amendment were successful in their efforts to correct the situation created by the Jefferson-Burr electoral vote tie in 1800. Senator Thomas Hart Benton, of Missouri, with the strong support of President Andrew Jackson, made this a prime object of his concern over a period of 20 years in the 1820's and 1830's. Senator Oliver H. P. Morton, of Indiana, led the fight in the 1880's. The late Senator George W. Norris was the principal proponent of reform in more recent times; his proposal for direct popular election of the President failed to command the necessary two-thirds of the Senate in 1934. In both the Seventy-second and Seventy-third Congresses, House committees unanimously reported resolutions calling for abolition of the electoral college. In the Eightieth Congress, another unanimous House Judiciary Committee report was submitted.

In fact, the first legislative proposal for a division of electoral votes on the basis of the popular vote was introduced in Congress just 102 years ago by Representative Lawrence of New York, in 1848.

A detailed statement prepared by the Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress, setting forth the historical background of the electoral college appears in the record of hearings, commencing at page 199. The full text of Arthur M. Schlesinger's analysis, from his 1949 book, Paths to the Present, is incorporated in the record of hearings, commencing at page 201. They are both worth reading. So much for the history. Let me now outline the principal evils of the present system.

PRINCIPAL EVILS OF THE PRESENT SYSTEM

Since the constitutional amendment proposed in Senate Joint Resolution 2 has as one of its objectives the correction of certain evils in our present method of electing the President, the need for reform is high lighted by a discussion of both the obvious and latent effects inherent in the electoral college—unit-rule system of choosing our President.

The indictment that can be drawn up against the present procedure is an impressive one. In general, there are three principal counts in this indictment:

First. The evils arising from the retention of the "dummy" office of presidential elector.

Second. The method of selecting a President when no candidate commands a majority of electoral votes.

Third. The defects and dangers which derive from the so-called unit-rule method of crediting all of a State's electoral votes to the plurality candidate.

An analysis of each of these three broad counts of the indictment follows:

1. RETENTION OF THE OFFICE OF ELECTOR

As stated by Schlesinger in the quotation appearing on page 3 above, the electoral college has degenerated into a mere rubber stamp. What is even worse, this rubber stamp has become an inaccurate rubber stamp. If there is anything any more useless than an inaccurate rubber stamp, I should like to know what it is. It has been also graphically stated that the electoral college is like the vermiform appendix in the human body. While it does no good and ordinarily causes no trouble, it continually exposes the body politic to the danger of political peritonitis. Any organ which has ceased to perform its function is sure to work mischief, if not positive detriment.

As was stated earlier, the framers of the Constitution visioned the individual member of the electoral college as an official who would exercise independent judgment. His responsibility was a grave one and it was thought that only men of prestige and ability would be selected for that office. These characteristics no longer are associated with the office of elector. In most instances today men elected to the post of Presidential elector are men whose names mean nothing whatsoever to the average voter. He is simply a straw man, or, as the phrase goes, a "man in livery" pledged in advance to vote for a certain candidate.

But it is most important to note that the individual elector is only morally bound to vote for candidates of his party for President and Vice President. He is not legally bound. In fact, recent State and Federal decisions make it very doubtful, indeed, whether a State can constitutionally impose a legal obligation on an elector to cast his vote for his party's candidate. It is possible, therefore, for individual members of the electoral college to cast their votes for whomsoever they please, utterly ignoring the mandate of the people and disregarding, if they so choose, their own pledges. Indeed, there have been several examples in the past of what I call the free-wheeling elector. In the 1948 elections a Tennessee elector, running on both the Democrat and Dixiecrat slates, cast his vote for the Dixiecrat candidate despite the fact that the State turned in a substantial plurality for the Democratic candidate.

This possibility that electors may legally disregard their pledges and, as we might say "desert to the enemy," creates a dangerous situation. If, on election day in November, it appeared that one candidate needed but one electoral vote to command a majority in the electoral college, the pressure on individual electors to do what the Tennessee elector did in 1948 would be tremendous. In fact, it is recalled that in the famous Tilden-Hayes contest of 1876, James Russell Lowell—who was a Hayes elector in Massachusetts—was most vehemently urged to cast his vote for Tilden, thus giving Tilden his necessary majority. Lowell turned a deaf ear on these pleas because of his firm belief in the moral duty of electors. Had he been a man of less tough moral fiber, his unilateral decision would have elected a President of the United States.

Another practical, harmful effect flowing from the retention of the office of elector is the unnecessary confusion caused the voter by printing on the ballot all the names making up the various slates of candidates for the office of presidential elector. It is a proven fact that this proliferation of names on the ballot all too frequently causes the confused voter to invalidate his ballot and thereby unintentionally disfranchise himself. Although many States have cured this particular evil by providing for the so-called short ballot, 26 States still print the long, and actually meaningless, list of all the candidates for the office of elector. In these States, complicated ballots make the splitting of ballots a nightmare, and the voter who attempts this futile—but often attempted—gesture finds his vote invalidated. This will explain cases where, as in Ohio in 1948, the vote for governor exceeded the valid vote for President. The invalidation of ballots caused by the fact that the voters have become confused by the printing of long lists of meaningless names might well spell the difference between one presidential candidate's carrying that State or not—and upon this, in turn, might rest the entire election.

Another complication which frequently arises in connection with the individual members of the electoral college concerns the qualification of electors. The Constitution provides that Members of Congress and Federal office holders are ineligible to serve as Presidential electors. Surprisingly enough, it happens not infrequently, as illustrated subsequently in this report, that ineligible electors successfully run for that office with the result that their votes for President and Vice President, if cast, are invalid. It might well happen that these invalidated electoral votes could spell the difference between success and disaster for a Presidential candidate.

There are also examples in our history where electors as a group have either failed to comply with law in the manner or time of casting their votes, or have been prevented by forces beyond their control from casting their votes upon the appointed day. Again, technicalities such as these could make a vital difference in the final tabulation of the electoral vote.

Perhaps the most alarming possible consequence of the electoral college system is the prospect that the electors, lacking the distinguished qualities envisioned by the framers of the Constitution, might be called on to exercise independent judgment in the election of the President. This would occur if the successful candidate on election day in November became incapacitated, either by reason of death or other disability, between election day and the day upon which the electors meet in the several States to cast their ballots. That is, the candidate might die after he had been elected. A similar, but not identical, situation occurred in 1872, when Horace Greeley, the Liberal Republican candidate, died shortly after the November elections. He was, however, in the minority, so that the precise problem under discussion did not arise.

It is certainly far from being a remote or improbable contingency that the successful candidate might become legally incapacitated from being eligible for the votes of the electoral college. Our practice of electing 531 relatively obscure individuals to the electoral college would indeed, under these circumstances, prove a boomerang. For the electors would then perforce have to exercise independent judgment in their selection of the President, and the resulting chaos, turmoil, and possible intrigue might well spell disaster for the Republic.

If a man who had been elected in November should die in December, the choice of the President of the United States would devolve on the presidential electors who are certainly not intended to perform the function which the people ought to perform for themselves.

One of the outstanding features, therefore, of the constitutional amendment proposed in Senate Joint Resolution 2 is its abolition of the fictitious and anachronistic office of Presidential elector, and its elimination of the complications and dangers which flow from retention of this "vermiform appendix" in the body politic.

2. ELECTIONS IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The second count in the indictment against the present method of electing the President concerns the constitutional provision which designates the House of Representatives as the final umpire of presidential elections in which no candidate receives a majority of the electoral votes.

A candidate, in order to win the election, must secure a majority of the whole number of electors, which at present means 266 votes. In case no person receives an electoral majority for President, the House of Representatives, voting by State units, elects the President from those receiving the three highest totals of electoral votes. A majority of the State votes—in other words, 25—is required to settle the issue.

Each State delegation is given one vote. New York has one vote, New Jersey has one vote, Connecticut has one vote, Texas has one vote. This vote is determined by the majority of its delegation. In the event a State delegation is evenly split, the State has no vote.

I believe that at the present time the State of New York has an odd number of Representatives, but if in a redistricting there should be 48 or 46, and the election of the President were thrown into the House of Representatives, and there were 23 Representatives voting for A and 23 voting for B, the entire vote of the State of New York would be excluded, and the approximately 14,000,000 persons in New York State would be completely disfranchised.

If no candidate for Vice President receives a majority of the electoral votes, the Senate proceeds to choose one of those who received the two highest totals of electoral votes. A majority of the Senators is required to elect.

This particular aspect of our election machinery has found very few, if any defenders. The chief criticism, of course, is the inequity that results from giving to all States, without regard to differences in population, equal power in electing the President. This procedure, it may be noted, entirely abrogates the basic principle upon which our whole approach to Presidential elections is predicated, namely, that each State's relative voting power shall be measured in terms both of the State as a unit, represented by the two electoral votes for the two Senators, and the State in terms of relative population, represented by the number of electoral votes for the number of Representatives. This means, simply, that each State has the same number of electoral votes as it has votes in Congress. But when an election is thrown into the House of Representatives, this principle is wholly disregarded and each State stands on an equal basis with every other State.

The fundamental evil, therefore, in this system is that it furnishes no accurate or assured way of reflecting the popular will.

The notable example in our history of an election in the House occurred in 1824. In the November elections, Andrew Jackson led his nearest opponent, John Quincy Adams, by approximately 50,000 popular votes. But Jackson lacked a majority in the electoral college, so the House of Representatives was called upon to umpire the decision. As a result of the manipulations of Henry Clay, who is supposed to have traded his support of Adams in return for a promise of the post of Secretary of State, Adams—the minority popular choice—was elected over Jackson and there followed what most historians describe as the "futile" administration of Adams.

Serious as is this possibility that the House of Representatives may completely thwart the popular will, a still more dangerous evil lurks behind the provision that the House shall umpire deadlocked presidential elections. It is entirely possible that the House itself might become deadlocked, with the result that Inauguration Day might come and go without a duly elected President.

Political analysts have demonstrated how the 1948 elections illustrate the possibility of this danger. A change of less than six-tenths of the votes from Mr. Truman in two States would have thrown the election into the House. A careful analysis of the 48 State delegations in the House have revealed that neither the Republicans nor the Democrats would have been able to command the constitutional majority of 25 States necessary to elect. At the outset of the Eighty-first Congress, 21 delegations had a Democratic majority, 20 delegations had a Republican majority, 3 were evenly divided, and 4 delegations represented States which were carried by the Dixiecrat candidate. That brings it very close to home, Mr. President. On the first ballot, consequently, the result would have been: For Mr. Truman, 21; for Mr. Dewey, 20; for Mr. Thurmond, 4. Assuming that the delegations from the 4 States carried by Mr. Thurmond had held fast, even the shift of the 3 evenly divided delegations either to Mr. Truman or to Mr. Dewey would not have commanded the requisite constitutional majority of 25. There is something to think about. It would have left Mr. Thurmond as the arbiter of the whole situation.

The result would have been a deadlock, with unbelievable pressures being brought to bear on the seven State delegations who held the balance of power. It is wholly probable that Inauguration Day would have arrived with no duly elected President. The twelfth amendment, the twentieth amendment, and the 1947 statute of succession are not clear as to precisely the manner in which this deadlock would have been resolved.

An election procedure which is so full of dangerous uncertainties as to leave the whole result of the election unresolved, even though a plurality of the people had expressed their preference at the polls in November, is certainly one which a country founded on the principle of popular government can ill afford to condone. This danger is indeed one which needs only to be stated, not argued.

The procedure contained in the constitutional amendment proposed in Senate Joint Resolution 2 makes this danger an impossibility. The successful candidates for President and Vice President need not obtain a majority of electoral votes; the person, to quote the language of the amendment, "having the greatest number of electoral votes for President shall be President. If two or more persons shall have an equal and the highest number of such votes," the amendment continues, "then the one for whom the greatest number of popular votes were cast shall be President." There can be no deadlocked decisions, and the universally condemned procedure of casting Congress in the role of final umpire is wholly eliminated.

3. THE UNIT-RULE METHOD OF COUNTING ELECTORAL VOTES

The third count in the indictment against our existing system for electing the President deals with the unit-rule method of awarding all of a State's electoral votes to the candidate commanding even a bare plurality of the State's popular vote. This method is sometimes known as the general ticket method of selecting electors.

It should be observed here that from the point of view of constitutional authority the States are free to adopt more equitable methods of selecting presidential electors, for article II, section 1, of the Constitution provides simply that each State shall appoint its electors in "such manner as the legislature thereof may direct." It is extremely unlikely, however, from a purely practical point of view, that the States could be induced severally and individually to switch from the prevailing general-ticket method. It is generally assumed, therefore, that a constitutional amendment is necessary to uproot the present system in order to establish a uniform and more accurate method of reflecting the popular will of the people.

The defects, unhealthy practices, and potential evils of the unit-rule or general ticket procedure for counting electoral votes are many and varied. Only those of particular importance will be outlined here.

(A) THE DISFRANCHISEMENT OF VOTERS EVIL

In effect, literally millions of American voters are disfranchised in every presidential election because of the unit-rule system.

This contention is more than a figure of speech. It is an actuality. The 1948 elections furnish an excellent example of this point.

Mr. Dewey received in the 16 States which he carried a total of 8,600,000 votes. These 16 States gave him a total of 189 electoral votes. But in the 32 States which Mr. Dewey failed to carry he had a total of 13,300,000 votes. This great mass of popular votes for Mr. Dewey gave him not one single electoral vote and, therefore, counted for naught. They were of no more effect than if they had not been cast at all.

In no other Federal election in our country does such a system for disregarding votes obtain. If A and B are running against each other for Senator in the State of Ohio, for example, each is credited with all the votes cast for him. Ohio does not provide that if A obtains 50.1 percent of the votes in Cleveland, then A shall be credited with all of Cleveland's votes and the 49.9 percent of popular votes cast for candidate B shall be wholly disregarded.

Yet that is the theory upon which our existing unit-rule system operates in the case of the election of President. And what is worse, not only are the votes which are cast for the candidate failing to command a plurality in a given State lost: they are taken away from that candidate and credited to his opponent. For example, in the 1948 elections, Mr. Dewey was credited with all of Connecticut's eight electoral votes, even though he commanded but a bare plurality of the popular votes. Some 423,000 votes were cast for Mr. Truman, but these votes were wholly disregarded in the computation of Mr. Truman's electoral strength, and, actually, they were all credited to Mr. Dewey. In other words, these 423,000 votes were computed precisely the opposite of the way they were cast.

It is this aspect of our present procedure which led former Representative Clarence F. Lea, of California, long an advocate of election reform and one of the leading experts on this subject to observe:

> Recently the Nation was shocked on learning that minor election officials out in Kansas City had used their position to make a theft of votes by counting them contrary to the way they were cast. A few hundred votes, or possibly a few thousand, were involved in the election to nominate a candidate for Congress.
> In the Presidential election of 1944, 21,384,797 votes, with the approval of the law under which we elect the President, were counted exactly contrary to the way they were cast.
>
> The difference, of course, in the two cases is that the Kansas City counting was illegal, and the Presidential counting is legal. The illegitimate effect, however, was the same—taking votes from one candidate and crediting them to another.

(B) THE "MINORITY PRESIDENT" EVIL

The term "minority President" is frequently used with two different meanings. It may refer to a President who is elected without a majority of the popular vote, but nevertheless with more popular votes than any of his opponents. This has happened in almost half—14—of the 32 elections for President between 1824 and 1948, inclusive.

It may also refer to a President who was elected despite the fact that he had fewer popular votes than his leading opponent. This has happened three times in our history—Adams in 1824, Hayes in 1876, and Harrison in 1888. It is in this latter meaning of the term "minority President" that we discuss the phase here.

Such a result as this is directly attributable to three characteristics of our election procedure: (a) The unit-rule method of counting electoral votes; (b) the distribution of electoral votes to States on the basis of the number of votes each State has in Congress; and (c) the fact that all save two of each State's electoral votes are awarded on the basis of population, rather than voting strength.

An extended analysis of how these three factors make possible the election of minority Presidents can be found in the record of hearings, pages 74–77.

The point which should be emphasized in this report, however, is the fact that it is primarily the unit-rule method of counting electoral votes which contributes to such anomalous results.

Allusion was made earlier to the fact that the electoral college has become a mere rubber stamp, and that it is, in fact, an inaccurate rubber stamp. When a rubber stamp begins to make mistakes, the time for discarding it is at hand. A very recent example of how this rubber stamp nearly made another mistake is in the 1948 elections. Here again we came dangerously close to electing a President even though he had fewer popular votes than his opponent. A shift of approximately 17,000 votes in Illinois, 3,500 votes in Ohio, and 9,000 votes in California would have transferred 78 electoral votes from Mr. Truman to Mr. Dewey, and the latter would have been elected President in spite of the fact that his opponent would have polled 2,000,000 more popular votes.

Former Representative Lea summarized this evil as follows:

> It is a mathematical certainty, confirmed by experience, that the electoral vote cast as a unit cannot accurately reflect the will of the population of the State or of its voters.
> The electoral vote cast as a unit has no logical mathematical relation to the popular will. A system under which a plurality of the popular vote can swing the whole 47 electoral votes of New York, or any other State, regardless of minority votes, totally lacks any mathematical justice in measuring the voting power of a State, or as between the States. There is no common denominator for such a calculation.

If we want to reach anything like an accurate reflection of the popular will in the election of a President, we must abolish the unit vote and let the electoral votes more accurately reflect the will of the voters of each State. That is the basic requirement of any just system. That means a method of counting votes that is just within the State and as between the different States.

The proponents of this constitutional amendment make no claim that it will wholly abolish the possibility of minority Presidents. But because this reform eliminates one of the three—and the principal—factors which foster such results, it is believed that possibility is greatly reduced. It can never be entirely eliminated without doing away with the two-electoral-vote bonus awarded each State regardless of population and without resorting to a direct popular election of the President, thus voiding the underlying Federal principle of equality of States in the Senate which made possible the adoption of the Constitution.

In other words, so long as each State has credit for two votes, representing each Senator, we are never going to get an accurate picture of the popular will. I do not claim that the proposed amendment will result in a completely accurate picture, but it will greatly improve the situation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERGUSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I take it the Senator would not have any objection to the elimination of the provision that two electoral votes shall be counted in the electoral college for the two Senators from a State; would he?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, I am not advocating that. I am keeping the electoral vote as a counting device, but I am doing away with the office of Presidential elector.

Mr. LONG. Then it would still be possible, even under the Senator's amendment, for a President to have the most popular votes, and yet not have the most electoral votes; would it not?

Mr. LODGE. It would still be mathematically possible, but it would be very unlikely indeed. It would be theoretically possible.

Mr. LONG. I notice that the committee amendment on page 3 suggests striking out the words "unless a more detailed calculation would change the result of the election." Will the Senator explain the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. LODGE. I shall be glad to. The amendment was recommended by the committee to take care of a theoretically possible, but practically most unlikely, situation. The words which are to be stricken out are "unless a more detailed calculation would change the result of the election." Conceivably a situation might arise in which, if the computation were carried out to four decimal places, the result of the election might be changed in favor of one candidate, whereas carrying the computation out to five places might favor the other candidate. This is an admittedly extremely improbable and remote contingency, but it was pointed out by a mathematician that it is mathematically possible, and that is the reason for the amendment.

Mr. LONG. Would it not seem fairer to carry out the calculation, if it is desired, to see who had the highest vote in the electoral college?

Mr. LODGE. The point is that if the calculation were carried out to four places, one result might be reached, and if it were carried to five places another might be reached, and the counting might never end at all. So, in view of that mathematical possibility, it was thought better to strike out this particular language.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I am glad the Senator raised that point, because I do not want anyone to think that the proposed constitutional amendment which I am advocating will completely eliminate the possibility of a man being elected President even though he has a minority of the popular vote. So long as we have the two-vote bonus for the two Senators from a State, we will never be able to do that. But let me call attention to what the Brookings Institution has to say on that point; and I submit, in all candor, that there is no institution of its kind which speaks with more authority. The Brookings Institution said, as appears on page 15 of the hearings, that the proposed system "has great advantages over the existing system in that it will practically eliminate the chance that a President will receive a majority of electoral votes despite the fact that his opponent polled a majority of the popular vote." Please note the words "practically eliminate."

I now come to what I call the doubtful State evil.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question at that point?

Mr. LODGE. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. LONG. I notice that the Senator would not have anything in the nature of a run-off, under his amendment. That is, if there were a third party, and the candidate of the third party might have sufficient votes to represent the difference between the other two candidates, there would not be a run-off between the two high candidates, would there?

Mr. LODGE. No; it would not be necessary or desirable. Under my proposal the candidate who carried each State would be affected by the reflection of the popular vote in the electoral vote count, whereas under the present system if a candidate gets a plurality of the vote of a State, he gets a hundred percent of the electoral vote. I do not think it would be necessary or desirable to have a run-off.

Mr. LONG. It occurs to me that if a third or even a fourth party had a substantial number of votes, it might be well to find out whom the majority of the people wanted to be President, rather than have one who could still be a minority President by virtue of the fact that there might have been a third or fourth party which might have polled a substantial number of votes, which would amount to the difference between the votes for the two other candidates.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think a run-off would be a desirable thing to have, I will say to the Senator from Louisiana.

(c) THE "DOUBTFUL STATE" EVIL

A further charge against the unit-rule system is that it strongly tends to overemphasize the political importance of the large politically doubtful States.

Mr. President, this has two significant effects. First, it means that presidential candidates from these States have a marked advantage over rivals from other States in the nomination struggle. Sixteen of the 26 major-party candidates since 1900—17, if Theodore Roosevelt be considered a major-party candidate in 1912—have come from New York or Ohio. It is a fact that the electoral vote power—unduly enhanced by the unit rule—and the close division of party strength in these States give them, in the words of Prof. Joseph E. Kallenbach of the University of Michigan, "a most salubrious climate for the growth of presidential timber." The Brookings Institution, commenting on this aspect of the proposed reform, stated—record of hearings, page 15:

In the selection of candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency the parties will be concerned with the capacity of the persons chosen to command the support of voters thrroughout the Nation and not upon their capacity to carry certain pivotal States or even big cities. Able men from small States will not be handicapped as they are at present.

The second effect of this doubtful State evil is of even greater importance. The so-called doubtful or pivotal States monopolize the attention of the candidates and the campaign-fund spenders during the canvass for popular votes, while other areas not regarded as doubtful are generally ignored. The testimony of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] on this point is relevant—record of hearings, page 39:

Very important to the Nation is the fact that this new system would require the Presidential campaigns to be waged in every State. This would provide a great educational process in every section of the country. As matters now stand, there are hardly any campaigns in certain of the Southern States or in New England. The strategists of the party get together in advance, claim some States, concede others, and wage their campaigns in the doubtful States. The pivotal States are the only ones that really enjoy the full benefits of a political campaign.

The President of the United States is the President of all the people. Certainly the voters before whom he must present his case have a right to expect that they will be included in his campaign for the highest office in the Nation. Citizens in the smaller populated States and in the so-called sure States have that right just as much as do their fellow citizens in the pivotal, doubtful States. They have an equal right to see the candidates for President, to judge him by his spoken words and his appearance, and to be educated on the issues. But so long as the Presidency turns upon a few doubtful, pivotal States it is natural to expect that they will be denied this right.

(D) THE "SURE STATE" EVIL

Another charge which can be leveled against the unit-rule system is that it perpetuates so-called solid or one-party States.

Voting statistics show a high correlation between the degree of closeness of the State-wide popular vote and the amount of popular participation. In the doubtful State there is a strong incentive for the voter to vote; in States where the outcome on a State-wide basis is a forgone conclusion, there is little incentive for the voter, regardless of his political inclinations, to take the trouble to register his preference.

The striking examples of solid States, of course, lie in a dozen States in the South and a few States in New England and the North Central area. Insofar as the situation in the South is concerned, Mr. C. S. Potts, dean emeritus of the Law School, Southern Methodist University, surely a notable authority, has stated the case forcefully, and I want to read an excerpt from his testimony—record of hearings, page 89:

The writer is convinced that the electoral college is largely responsible for keeping the solid South solid. * * * Is it a matter of wonder that States that are never visited by candidates and campaign speakers, States to which no literature or campaign workers are ever sent, continue to vote the same party from year to year, even from generation to generation? What influence is ever brought to bear upon them to change their political allegiance?

The politicians in these States are active and the masses of people are sometimes mildly excited until the national conventions have been held and the rival candidates are placed in the field. But from that day until the November election, the "solid" States only catch faint echoes of the great struggle that is going on in a narrow belt of States farther north, and the citizens of these States are almost as completely idle spectators of the contests as are the people of Mexico or Canada.

The only part they have in the campaign is to be called on from time to time to contribute money to help pay the expenses of the campaigns, but no part of the money is ever spent within their borders. It is safe to say that south of Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri there are 6,000,000 voters who have never heard a campaign speech delivered by the Presidential candidate of either of the two great parties, after their nomination for office.

The writer—

This is Mr. Potts, dean emeritus of the Law School of Southern Methodist University, speaking—believes that the abolition of the electoral college would work the political readmission of the solid South into the Union. When the votes in Georgia are worth just as much as votes in Indiana, Georgia will be cultivated by the parties just as assiduously as Indiana is now cultivated.

As it is now, the voter says to himself, "What is the use of my going to the polls in November? There is no chance that my vote will do any good, for everybody knows beforehand that Georgia will give her electoral vote to the Democratic candidate."

The result is that there is an enormous stay-at-home vote, alike of Republicans and Democratic voters. Not only so, but the Republican Party finds it impossible to win new recruits among the native southern population or to hold its members who move into the solid South from elsewhere. The voter realizes that as a Republican his vote is utterly worthless so far as the result of the national election is concerned, but by becoming a Democrat, he can go into the Democratic primaries and have a real share in settling State and local matters. Hence, we find that most Republicans, upon moving into the Southern States, soon cease to affiliate with their party and vote the Democratic ticket.

That is the testimony of Mr. Potts, formerly dean of the Law School of Southern Methodist University, who, I think, is well qualified to have an opinion on a question of this kind.

Of course, in slightly varying degrees, this analysis applies with equal logic to the other one-party areas in the country.

It is sometimes emphasized that in the so-called solid States one electoral vote represents far fewer votes than does one electoral vote in other parts of the Nation. It has been pointed out, for example, that each electoral vote in the South represents an average of 40,000 popular votes, as against an average of 110,000 votes per electoral vote in the remaining 37 States of the North and Central States.

To a very substantial extent, the unit-rule system is responsible for this disparity between the relative weight of electoral votes throughout the country. So long as States have a bonus of two electoral votes regardless of population, some disparity, of course, will always exist. But because the unit rule perpetuates solid areas and because in solid areas the general election vote is always comparatively light, the principal contributing factor remains the unit rule.

It should be observed that when statisticians compute how much weight is to be given to an electoral vote they always use the general election figures. These figures are usually very markedly smaller than the primary election figures in one-party States. The 1948 statistics are not presently available, but in 1946, in South Carolina, for example, 13 percent of the population voted in the primaries, while only about 1½ percent voted in the November elections. Think of that. In Georgia the relationship was 15 percent in the primaries and 4½ percent in the general elections. In Mississippi it was 6 percent in the primaries and 0.2 percent in the general elections. In Texas 28 percent of the population voted in the primaries; only 5 percent turned out for the general elections. A similar pattern recurs in other Southern States. These figures are significant for two principal reasons: (a) They clearly demonstrate that the statistics showing how many popular votes one electoral vote represents are not based on the real voting strength of the South. Real voting strength is more accurately reflected, in most cases, in the primary elections. (b) The real voting interest in the South is manifest in primaries where there is a real contest. When there is no contest, apathy is the natural result to expect.

The Brookings Institution, referring to Senate Joint Resolution 2, summarized this whole problem in these words—record of hearings, page 15:

Sure States will no longer be neglected as they are at present both in nominations and campaigns because a substantial minority vote in these States will result in electoral votes for the candidate of their party. Voters opposed to the dominant party in their respective States will be encouraged to work and vote for their candidates because their work and votes may actually affect the results. Their votes will be cast and counted for the candidates of their choice and not thrown away as under the present system.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Is it not true that if the election of a President were to be decided on the basis of the popular vote, there would be a much greater attendance at the polls than there would be if the measure sponsored by the Senator from Massachusetts should go into effect?

Mr. LODGE. I think that is true. I think there would be a greater attendance, yes. As the Senator from North Dakota knows, I have been in favor of a direct popular vote, but, being a realist, I discovered some years ago that it was an impossibility to achieve, because it did away with the principle of equality of States in the Senate. But I think unquestionably a direct popular vote would increase interest very much.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, or would he rather not be interrupted?

Mr. LODGE. I am delighted to be interrupted.

Mr. WHERRY. Can the Senator, from his study of the subject, give us assurance, if the joint resolution is passed and the constitutional amendment ratified, that in the South, members of either or both major parties will take advantage of the situation which will then exist? How does the Senator really know that, in the final analysis, it would develop a two-party system, and that interest would be developed in another party than the one in which there seems to be the greatest interest now? My reason for asking the question is that people belong to this or that party, they belong to this or that church, and it seems to me very difficult to get them out of one into the other. Change from one party to the other, it seems to me, could be brought about only after long effort and much education. Does the Senator have any observations to present, other than those he has presented, to indicate that, if the proposed amendment were to be ratified, in the South greater interest would be taken in another party than the one which dominates the South today?

Mr. LODGE. Of course, that is a very important consideration, and one to which I have given a great deal of thought.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for an observation?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. From my own experience, I know what it means in a general election to lose a ward or lose a precinct which is 99-percent Democratic. It is possible that a person who registers as a member of one party, may vote with another in the general election.

Mr. LODGE. My answer is that of course this question involves a guess as to the future. Everything we do in the Senate involves a guess as to the future.

So this proposal is not different from any other proposal, in that respect.

Some persons have said, "Oh, you want to change the system because of some guess you are making about the future."

Of course, Mr. President, as I have said, everything we do here involves a guess about the future. We are not legislating about the past. Every time a Senator reaches an opinion, he is making up his mind about what the future will hold.

For instance, if in a room there is a hungry dog that has not had anything to eat for a long time, and if in a corner of the room there is placed a dish with some meat in it, the dog will go to that corner of the room to get the meat.

That is the kind of judgment I am making here. It seems to me that I am making a rather conservative assumption; I do not think it is a rash assumption at all. Given the natural inclination of Americans to take part in political activity, and given the fact that we have a competitive party system in the United States, in which two parties are competing with each other—although in the past few years one of them has been winning the competition from time to time, and the other has been losing it—and given the temperament of the American people and the competitive nature of the party managers of the two political parties, it seems to me simply inconceivable that the adoption of this proposed constitutional amendment would not result in a change in the voting complexion in the so-called politically solid areas.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPARKMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I did not mean to have my question interpreted so as to indicate that I was worried too much about the future. Of course, I should like to see a strong two-party system, as the Senator from Massachusetts well knows, not only in the South, but throughout the United States. I favor that. But, referring to the illustration the Senator gave, let me say that in putting the meat in one place in a room, rather than in another, we must be sure that it will attract both, not just one. That is the idea.

My point was not in regard to where the meat would be placed or where the dog would go to get the meat; but I should like to know whether the Senator has any other observations to offer in regard to the question of whether by opening up the system so that the popular vote will be registered, the result will be to produce any more effective organization in another party than has already been accomplished.

Mr. LODGE. Let me give the Senator another answer to that question. Let us say, for purposes of making the arithmetic simple, that a certain State has 10 electoral votes. Let us say that it is located in a one-party area—either in the Solid South or in northern New England or in the North Central area from which the Senator from Nebraska comes. Let us say that in the election the Democrats get 80 percent of the popular vote and the Republicans get 20 percent of the popular vote. Under the present system the Democrats would get all 10 electoral votes and the Republicans would get none. Under such a system there is no incentive for any Republican Party worker or candidate or bright young man or anyone else to lift his finger to get out the Republican vote or to try to persuade persons to become Republicans. But under the system which I now propose, the Republicans, who constituted 20 percent of the total vote, would get two electoral votes, and those two electoral votes would be added to whatever other electoral votes the Republicans got in other States. As the Senator knows, with that possibility in existence there would be a tremendous incentive to organize torchlight parades, moonlight sails, and party meetings of all sorts, in order to get as many votes as possible, because credit would be received for all the votes which were obtained, whereas under the present system that is not the case.

Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. WHERRY. That is a part of the question, and I appreciate the Senator's reply. It brings out what the Senator has in mind, namely, that if the popular vote is taken, at least the minority will receive credit for what it has done in the States, and therefore that, of itself, will strengthen the interest in developing a stronger party organization.

Perhaps the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has already mentioned that point in his speech. I have not heard all his speech, I regret to say, although I have tried to be here. But I think that point should be brought out, because it is my feeling that if the so-called solid States, in various sections of the country, are to give up the electoral college system, under which one party now gets credit for all the electoral votes, naturally that party would have to make a gain in the marginal States or the closely contested States and in the solid South, where it now is not getting credit for its votes.

So it seems to me that it is one thing to say that a popular vote would do that, and another thing to show how it might be done. In other words, in order to convince those who might feel that to give up the unit rule, under which their party now enjoys a solid vote, would be a handicap to them, it is obviously desirable to show them that to make the exchange might result in some advantage to them in other areas.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, that is an absolutely correct point. I hope I have given the Senator two intelligent answers; at least, I have tried to do so.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator. Of course, torchlight parades would increase the interest in the party any way. But I am interested in this matter because under the proposed system the individual will get credit, in the electoral vote of the State, for the work he does, and therefore that will increase the interest generally, and will increase the activities of the party and the interest in the party system.

Mr. LODGE. That is correct. The dean of Southern Methodist University and many others of equal political stature unanimously believe that if this system were in effect, the party line-up in the one-party areas would change.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I am delighted to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. If we analyze the vote taken in the last presidential election, would the result have been any different under the system proposed by this measure than it was under the electoral college system?

Mr. LODGE. Of course, if the system now proposed had been in effect at the time of the last election, people would have voted differently. That is the first point. But in order to show how it would work out as a matter of mechanics, let us assume that the popular vote would have been cast as it actually was cast, although, of course, that would not have been the case. But assuming that, we find that whereas under the present system President Truman received 303 electoral votes and Mr. Dewey received 189, under the proposed system, Mr. Truman would have received 258 electoral votes, Mr. Dewey would have received 221.4 electoral votes, and Mr. Wallace would have received 9.4. That is merely an illustration of the mechanical workings of the system now proposed, if we assume that the popular vote would have been cast in the same way, although, of course, that would not have been the case, because the Republicans would have made tremendous efforts to obtain votes in the solid South, and those efforts undoubtedly would have achieved something; and the Democrats would have made great efforts in northern New England and in the North Central States, and their efforts also would have achieved something. So the efforts thus made would have achieved definitely different results. But the illustration I have just presented gives an idea of how the proposed system would work.

(E) THE PRESSURE-GROUP EVIL

Now, let me come to what I call the pressure-group evil. One of the most serious charges against the unit-rule aspect of our present system is the undeniable fact that it not only permits but actually encourages and invites the domination of presidential campaigns by small, organized, well-disciplined minority or pressure groups within the large so-called pivotal States. These pressure groups may or may not be organized into splinter parties with candidates of their own in the field, but whether they go under a party label or whether they simply operate as a bloc of votes, their influence is frequently a key factor in determining whether all of a State's electoral votes will go to one or the other of the major party candidates.

Commenting on this phase of the problem, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] testified—record of hearings, page 42:

> It seems to me that splinter parties would have less bargaining power than at present, since their influence on the electoral vote of the States would be in direct proportion to their popular vote, whereas at the present time a splinter party has a tremendous power in a State if it is a balance-of-power party and its minority votes can determine completely how the electoral vote of the State will go.

The fact that pressure groups do hold a balance of power in States where the contest between the two major parties is close—and I call attention to the situation in New York State in the 1948 election, where Henry Wallace's party certainly exercised very great power—is an evil of the unit-rule system that has far-reaching but understandable effects. It causes both of the major parties to give undue attention to the demands and programs of relatively unimportant groups or factions. Because of the strategic position which these groups may occupy, even though in the over-all national scene the particular group may not be numerically important, they may be the vital pivot upon which a large block of electoral votes will turn. Hence, the major parties feel it necessary to make large concessions and enter strong bids for their support.

Representative ED GOSSETT, of Texas, had this comment to make during the course of the hearings:

> Of late we have become rightly alarmed over the activities of the Communist Party in the United States. Strange to say, this party has its greatest following and influence in the large pivotal States. This party and its fellow travelers are shrewd political manipulators. What grim irony it would be if they should swing the balance of power and be responsible for the election of a President of the United States.

In its report on the constitutional amendment proposed in Senate Joint Resolution 2, the Brookings Institution summarized this particular condition as follows—record of hearings, page 15:

> This constitutional amendment will practically remove the chance that small minority groups can attain and exercise great power over Presidents, presidential candidates, and political parties because they hold the balance of power in certain pivotal States. These minority groups will have no power beyond that justified by their number of voters in a presidential election.

(F) THE "LANDSLIDE PSYCHOLOGY" EVIL

Finally, in the list of evils of the present system which I am making, I come to what I call the "landslide psychology" evil.

Because the electoral college, through the operation of the unit-rule system, is an inaccurate rubber stamp, it grossly magnifies the victory of the winner and exaggerates the defeat of the loser. Because it fails to reflect the will of the people, it frequently gives a false impression of a sweeping triumph, coupled with an ignominious rout for the candidate placing second. This is due, of course, to the fact that the illogical unit-rule system seldom permits the electoral vote figures to correspond at all with the popular vote figures.

One of the most striking examples of this gross distortion of popular sentiment occurred in the 1936 elections. Mr. Landon received almost 39 percent of the popular vote, yet the electoral college tally credited him with only 1½ percent of the electoral vote. Other illustrations compiled by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] appear in the record of hearings at page 75.

As the popular vote and the electoral vote more nearly correspond, the illusion of a landslide is dispelled. It is certainly doubtful whether a false landslide psychology is good for a democracy, which needs stability as well as ferment. Much violent energy may be lost in apparently violent swings of the pendulum.

The natural effect of landslide psychology is, of course, obvious. Legislators, high officials in the executive branch of the Government, and organs of public opinion may be deceived largely because of the exaggeration that characterizes the distribution of the electoral votes. A system, such as that proposed in this constitutional amendment, which seeks a more equitable distribution of electoral votes has the virtue of giving both victors and the vanquished a better understanding of their responsibilities and opportunities. It affords a more accurate yardstick whereby "mandates" can be measured.

ADVANTAGES OF THE PROPOSED SYSTEM

I now desire to discuss the advantages of the proposed system, having stressed the evils of the present system.

In the preceding section, the principal evils, dangers, and defects of the present method of electing the President and Vice President were discussed. In this section, the committee lists those features of the constitutional amendment proposed in Senate Joint Resolution 2 which are of affirmative benefit.

These advantages are of two types: First, those which correct specific defects; and, second, those which have an independent positive benefit of their own.

The corrective features of the proposed reform may be very briefly listed, since a discussion of the defects of the present system necessarily included some mention of the manner in which the proposed amendment seeks to meet them.

(a) Since the new system entirely does away with the office of presidential elector, all of the disadvantages of this clumsy arrangement disappear. The amendment recognizes that the electoral-college system has never functioned as originally conceived by the framers of the Constitution. The ghost elector becomes a thing of the past, and with his demise there perishes also the possibility that individual electors may go directly counter to the expressed will of the voters—as has happened—and cast their ballots because of personal preference, or even whim or caprice. That happened in the case of a Tennessee elector in the 1948 election. There can be no so-called desertions to the enemy when the procedure for counting electoral votes is automatic and fixed by law.

The abolition of the electoral college will prevent a countless number of votes from being invalidated in many States because of the complications and confusion resulting from the printing of long lists of electors' slates on the ballot.

The proposed amendment eliminates the possibility that an election of the President might turn on whether a given slate of electors were prevented from gathering on the legally appointed day to cast their pro forma ballots for President and Vice President. In 1857 the whole electoral vote of Wisconsin was challenged because that State's electors had been held up by a blizzard and were not able to meet at the State capital to cast their votes on the day appointed by law. Fortunately, their votes were not decisive.

It obviates the chance that a whole election might turn on whether a single elector in a given State was legally eligible to hold that office. After the 1948 November elections, several of the duly chosen electors in Virginia discovered they were ineligible to serve by reason of their holding Federal offices of one sort or another. Had their ineligibility not been discovered in time and had they cast their votes as electors, the revelation later that they were ineligible would have caused these votes to be invalidated. In an extremely close division of the electoral vote the result of the election could thus be affected.

The uncertainty and the element of human frailty is an inevitable part of the present system of human electors. These uncertainties and possibilities that entire elections might turn on the qualifications or whims of a single individual elector are abolished forever.

Then, too, the elimination of the electoral college prevents a group of relatively obscure men from electing the President in the event the successful candidate, according to the preference expressed in the November elections, dies or becomes otherwise disqualified prior to the legal election by the electoral college. The President, under the new system, is elected on election day in November. The voters will not be expressing a mere preference by voting for electors. The voters will be voting directly for President, with the electoral-vote system retained merely as a counting device, stripped of the perils of human behavior.

(b) The present uncertainty inherent in our existing system whereby the failure to gain a majority of electoral votes throws the election into the House of Representatives is eliminated. The nightmarish prospect of the United States being without a duly elected President on Inauguration Day is forever dispelled. The turmoil, unrest, intrigue, and possible frustration of the popular will by an election of the President in Congress will no longer confront us. The long period of uncertainty, which might have very grave effects on our foreign as well as domestic policy, intervening between November election day and the convening of the new Congress, would no longer be possible.

The proposed new system has the great advantage of promoting absolute certainty in the election of the President. Unresolved deadlocks become absolutely out of the question.

(c) Because the proposed constitutional amendment provides for the automatic division of a State's electoral votes on the basis of the popular vote, all the evils inherent in the unit-rule method of counting electoral votes are either wholly eliminated or greatly minimized.

The counting procedure would be legally uniform in all the States.

No longer would millions of voters be disfranchised and their votes appropriated to the candidate against whom they voted. No votes would be lost. Every vote for President would count.

The possibility that a President might be elected in spite of the fact that he polled fewer popular votes than his opponent would be virtually eliminated for the simple reason that the new system would bring the electoral vote and the popular vote much closer together.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I was interested in the observation of the Senator that the electors might not vote for the choice of the party by which they were elected. I ask the Senator if there does not seem to be an increasing tendency on the part of electors to vote for a candidate other than the candidate of their party? For example, in the 1944 election there were a great many rumors to the effect that some of the electors in certain States were not going to follow the party dictates, and, as the Senator has pointed out, in the 1948 election there were not only rumors to that effect, but one elector actually voted differently from the slate upon which he was elected. Does not the Senator feel that, in years to come, the tendency might grow and that we might as the result have a very troublesome situation?

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senator is entirely right. Not only in the 1944 election but also in the 1948 election there were instances of what might be called free-wheeling electors, who ran ostensibly as rubber stamps, with an agreement to vote for the Democratic candidate, if he carried the State, or for the Republican candidate, if he carried it, but who then voted as they personally, individually pleased. The Senator is quite right that if two or three electors can do that, then there is no reason why a great many more cannot do it; and, if that happens the whole system of electing the President is dangerously subverted.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I may ask the Senator if that does not mean, then, that not only is the voter voting in the dark, but actually in the case of Tennessee in the last election, a voter who thought he was voting for the Democratic candidates was actually casting only eleven-twelfths of a vote; he did not have the right to his full vote when he cast his ballot?

Mr. LODGE. Of course, there can be no question about that. In such a case the voter does not really vote for President at all.

I am now summarizing, Mr. President, the advantages of the system here proposed.

Presidential campaigns, campaign effort, and campaign funds would no longer be almost exclusively concentrated in the big pivotal doubtful States, to the exclusion of the smaller populated States or sure States. This method of making every vote for President count would tend to spread the campaign and any subsequent presidential activity into all the 48 States.

It would therefore, politically speaking, also tend to break up so-called solid or one-party areas.

It would discourage the prevailing tendency to nominate presidential candidates only from among the residents of those States having a large electoral vote. The danger and detriment to the general welfare is obvious when the field of presidential possibilities is so restricted. The whole Nation should be the field from which to select Presidents.

It would effectively and substantially reduce the undue influence which balance-of-power minority, pressure, or "splinter" factions exercise in the large pivotal States and the big cities. No longer would these groups be capable of swinging large blocks of electoral votes—and perhaps the election. These factions, if they enter the arena of presidential politics at all, would have to do so purely on the basis of their own merit. They would be no stronger than the number of votes actually cast for them. Because their numbers are small, they would in all probability receive little national attention. Their frequently assumed role of pivot in key States would no longer give them their presently exaggerated importance.

The illusion that a relatively close election was an overwhelming victory for the successful candidate and a crushing defeat for the loser would be dispelled.

Aside from these corrective advantages of the proposed procedure for election of the President, some independently affirmative benefits would result.

(a) By effecting a compromise between the existing system and the idea of a direct, popular election of the President, the amendment would completely preserve and protect the rights of the small States. No State is given any greater power in electing a President than it has in passing a bill through Congress, and by retaining the distribution of electoral votes on the basis of each State's number of Congressmen and Senators, this power is in no way diminished. The rights of the small States, as effected in the so-called great compromise of the Constitutional Convention in 1787, are in no way abridged under this new arrangement.

(b) The proposed system of dividing each State's electoral vote in proportion to its popular vote offers a far more accurate and equitable method of reflecting popular sentiment within that State. Under the existing procedure, were one denied access to the popular-vote totals, it would be completely impossible to tell whether a State had voted overwhelmingly in favor of the candidate carrying that State or whether he had gained all of its electoral votes in a photo-finish. Considered from that point of view, therefore, this new system enhances a State's voice in presidential politics because of the accurate barometer it furnishes of the popular will in the State.

(c) Perhaps the greatest benefit which the proponents and supporters of this reform believe would result from its incorporation into the Constitution is the prospect that it would greatly enhance and invigorate the two-party system in the United States. The record contains many strong expressions of opinion on this point. I should merely like to read two of them. One is from the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], who, as shown by the record of the hearings at pages 25 and 26, observed:

> There are still great variations in the economic, educational, and cultural patterns of this country, from State to State and region to region, which still need the protection which our system of checks and balances gives. We protect this diversity of interests, by our constitutional system and by our two-party Government, in such a manner that our Government is rarely perfectly representative of any of its people in all its programs, but is generally a common meeting ground of a great number of its people.
> This system of checks and balances, of which the electoral vote is a part, is the result of basic compromise, and is itself properly to be used as a lever of compromise, avoiding extremes, and requiring our people and our Government to pursue a course which is fair to the country as a whole.
> We are not changing this system by Senate Joint Resolution 2, but rather we are attempting to make it work better, to be more expressive of its underlying concept. We are attempting to perfect a part of the great compromise which made our federation successful.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] made the following observations regarding the effect of the proposed amendment on the two-party system—record of hearings, page 39:

> Insofar as advantages to one party or the other are concerned, it is my impression that both would benefit. The adoption of this system would make the Republican Party a Nation-wide instead of a sectional party. The Democratic Party is already Nation-wide. But under the new system, we would have stronger party control in this Nation which is based on the strong two-party plan. A vote in Mississippi or Maine, for example, would count just as much as a vote in Pennsylvania or Ohio. All our people would have the great benefit of considering the issues, of having candidates or top-flight speakers explain the issues to them in person. This will do much toward giving us an enlightened electorate which is very desirable.
> You may think that some of us from the South would prefer not to have a strong two-party system. I do think it is important that we do have a real two-party system in the Nation; it is the only manner in which we can operate successfully our republican form of government. The election processes and the party processes would be strengthened greatly in all parts of the Union if the people were able to choose between party philosophies.

To that I should like to add this personal observation, that every State stands to gain when there is a competitive party situation within the State. If there is not, then the State is taken for granted. It is taken for granted in the councils of the party in power, because it is said, "We have you, anyway; we do not need to bother with you." It is taken for granted by the party out of power because it is said, "There is no use in our paying attention to you, because the cards are too hopelessly against us, anyway." So, Mr. President, a State in which there is no competitive situation between the two parties suffers in comparison with States in which there is a competitive situation.

Mr. President, I should like to list the objections which have been made to this proposal and to answer them briefly.

Certain objections were heard. These objections related chiefly to those portions of the proposed constitutional amendment which provide for a division of a State's electoral votes in proportion to its popular vote. No testimony was heard in objection to the provisions which abolish the office of presidential elector and which eliminate elections in the House of Representatives.

The three principal criticisms were: First, that the new system would encourage proliferation of multiple parties; second, that it would introduce the principle of proportional representation at the presidential level; and, third, that the proposed method for counting the electoral vote would work to the disadvantage of one or the other of the two major political parties.

There were detailed answers made to those objections with which I shall not burden the Senate, but the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] propounded a number of questions which were penetrating and intelligent, and I furnished answers which I hope were intelligent, and they will be found on pages 73 to 78 of the hearings. They contain most of the criticisms of the proposal, together with the answers directed thereto. But let me briefly summarize the answers to the objections.

The answer to the objection that this new system would greatly encourage and give increased power to splinter parties and various minority groups has been stated earlier in this report.

Actually, as it has been stated before, this method of counting the electoral vote so as more exactly to reflect the popular will would have the effect of minimizing, rather than encouraging, the influence of multiple parties and pressure factions. For example, in the 1948 elections the Wallace vote, though meager by comparison to the total vote cast, threw two States to Mr. Dewey. Small groups in the large pivotal States now hold an enormous bargaining power because they may add enough votes to either party—or withhold enough votes from either party—to swing 47 electoral votes in New York or 35 electoral votes in Pennsylvania, one way or the other.

If the electoral votes of these and all other States were divided among the candidates in accord with their relative standing at the polls, the influence of minority groups would be measured by their numbers or the merits of their case, rather than on the basis of their bargaining power. Against this prediction that the reasonable effect of this new system would be to deflate splinter parties, the fact that some minority parties might get a small fraction of electoral votes equivalent to its fraction of the popular vote seems utterly insignificant.

I have heard persons say that because in the 1948 election Wallace would have received 9.4 electoral votes, assuming that the popular vote had been cast the same way, instead of nothing, as was the case under the present system, a great lever would be afforded for building up a third party. I cannot understand that argument. It seems to me it is not an advantage at all. Certainly, it is no advantage when we compare it with the advantage which splinter parties now have of being able to throw the whole vote of a large State one way or the other.

The second objection relates to what is termed proportional representation. The contention was made that this new method of counting the electoral vote for President and Vice President would introduce the principle of proportional representation at the Presidential level. This was dealt with very thoroughly in the hearings. This new system has no similarity to proportional representation. Proportional representation is a means of reflecting every shade of popular opinion in a legislative body. It does encourage splinter parties, of course, and thus makes it more difficult for any dominant group to carry out a consistent policy.

In a city council or a legislature there could be a perfect rainbow of parties. That is true in some European countries. It is completely inapplicable to the election of a single official to one position, such as the President of the United States. Even the cleverest surgeon cannot divide one man up—proportionally or otherwise—and expect him to live. The argument of proportional representation simply does not apply at all in the case of the election of a single official. The only place it could be applied would be in a city council or a legislature, where there are many persons elected by the people.

The third objection I label "political disadvantages." Some people say the proposed amendment would give the Republican Party a legalistic advantage over the Democratic Party, or would operate to the advantage of the Democratic Party at the expense of the Republican Party. I have heard both statements made. I categorically deny either of those contentions. It seems to me that this joint resolution removes obstacles in the way of a vigorous and healthy two-party system. The question of partisan advantage depends on the energy, imagination, and ability of American party leadership. These are qualities which cannot be created by constitutional amendment.

I think we must agree that if the present system is wrong, dangerous, and unfair—which I believe it to be—then it should be reformed regardless of party advantage. There are many people today who believe that our political parties give altogether too much thought to the political advantage which accrues to a party organization and not sufficient thought to the consideration that our parties exist to serve the people and have no other excuse for being. I think it depends on the imagination and the energy which both parties show in taking advantage of the situation. But if a reform needs to be made, let us make it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a detail line-by-line analysis of this amendment.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANALYSIS OF SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 2

In this analysis, the provisions of the joint resolution are quoted sentence by sentence with a brief explanation of each.

Page 1, line 9, of the proposed amendment reads:

"SECTION 1. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of 4 years, and together with the Vice President chosen for the same term, be elected as provided in this Constitution."

This is a reenactment of paragraph 1 of section 1 of article II. The only difference from the present paragraph is that the paragraph which now provides that the President be elected "as follows" is proposed to be changed to read, be elected "as provided in this Constitution."

When this paragraph was originally written, it was followed by the paragraphs providing the manner of electing the President. The twelfth amendment was later adopted and also the twentieth amendment. This change in the language of paragraph 1 simply conforms to the newer arrangement of the provisions relating to the election of the President.

Page 2, line 3:

"The electoral college system of electing the President and Vice President of the United States is hereby abolished."

The electoral college system was originally created by article II, section 1, paragraphs 2 and 3, of the Constitution and later by the twelfth amendment. These provisions specify the number of electors to which each State is entitled, and the time and method of choosing them. The sentence quoted would abolish these features of the Constitution. The electoral college would cease to exist. There would be no presidential electors.

This general provision is implemented in section 2 by repealing paragraphs 2 and 3 of section 1 of article II and the twelfth amendment.

Page 2, line 5:

"The President and the Vice President shall be elected by the people of the several States."

That language conforms to article I, section 2, providing for the election of Representatives, and to the language in amendment XVII providing for the direct election of Senators.

Page 2, line 6:

"The electors of each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature."

This language conforms to article XVII providing for the election of Senators and to article I, section 2, providing for the election of Representatives. This provision follows the general policy of the Constitution in leaving the qualifications of voters to the States. It prescribes the same qualifications for the presidential election that the State prescribes for members of the most numerous branch of its legislature.

This provision requires no uniformity of qualification of voting as between the different States. It in no way disturbs the jurisdiction and authority of the States over the franchise and elections. It in no way meddles with State sovereignty or the right of States to specify the qualifications of its voters or the manner in which they shall vote or have their votes counted. The purity of the ballot box is left entirely within State control.

This provision is, of course, now subject to the possible reduction of representation in the House under the fourteenth amendment or to a denial of the right to vote because of sex.

Page 2, line 8:

"Congress shall determine the time of such election, which shall be the same throughout the United States. Unless otherwise determined by the Congress, such election shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November of the year preceding the year in which the regular term of the President is to begin."

This is substantially the language of article II, section 1, clause 3, of the Constitution, which refers to the selection of presidential electors.

This language, of course, provides for the election of the President in November at the date on which we now select presidential electors who later elect the President.

Page 2, line 14:

"Each State shall be entitled to a number of electoral votes equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in Congress."

This is the substance of the language in article II, section 1, paragraph 2 of the Constitution, fixing the number of electors to which each State is now entitled.

This provision retains the present voting power of the State in the election of the President in precisely the same degree as now established. In other words, the vote of the State will be translated into electoral votes as at present, but without the intervening device of the presidential electors.

This provision assures each State that it will retain its electoral voting strength as at present.

Page 2, line 18:

"Within 45 days after such election, or at such time as the Congress shall direct, the official custodian of the election returns of each State shall make distinct lists of all persons for whom votes were cast for President, and the number of votes for each, and the total vote of the electors of the State for all persons for President, which lists he shall sign and certify and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate."

This language is similar to article XII in reference to the report of the vote of the presidential electors (the electoral college).

At the present time, the members of the electoral college sign and certify and transmit the returns directed to the President of the Senate. Under the language just quoted, the official custodian of the election returns of each State shall make the lists and transmit them directly to the President of the Senate. The election returns of each State are placed in the custody of some official by State law.

The provision requiring the election returns to be made in 45 days is for the purpose of fixing a definite day so that the returns will reach Congress well in advance of the time now fixed for counting votes in the House.

Page 3, line 1:

"The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all certificates and the votes shall then be counted. Each person for whom votes were cast for President in each State shall be credited with such proportion of the electoral votes thereof as he received of the total vote of the electors therein for President."

This provision may be regarded as one of the dominating features of this proposal. It is included in the firm belief that there can be no fair system of electing the President that does not provide for a division of the electoral votes of each State to be credited to the candidates for whom the votes were cast.

This provision requires that each candidate in the State be credited with the same proportion of the electoral vote as he received of its popular vote.

It preserves the relative voting strength of the State as at present.

This provision assures that every vote for President and Vice President will count. It eliminates the wholesale disfranchisement of minority votes to which reference has been made earlier in this report. The States are given electoral votes in proportion to their population, plus the two votes regardless of population.

In the last analysis, the purpose of an election is to register the will of the people. This cannot accurately be accomplished, with certainty and justice, unless the votes as counted reflect the will of those who cast them.

"In making the computations, fractional numbers less than one one-hundredth shall be disregarded."

In dividing electoral votes among candidates in proportion to the popular vote, it is desirable to include fractional numbers, inasmuch as in some instances 1 electoral vote may represent 100,000 or more popular votes. These fractional numbers are counted up to three points beyond the decimal, but beyond that are eliminated in order to avoid the use of inconsequential fractions, and also to provide a uniform treatment in the interest of simplicity.

As originally introduced in Senate Joint Resolution No. 2, this sentence contained the phrase "unless a more detailed calculation would change the result of the election," following the period. The committee, in order to conform with the language of the companion joint resolution, favorably acted on by the House committee, has made a minor perfecting amendment here by striking out that phrase.

Senator LODGE pointed out that the words "unless a more detailed calculation would change the result of the election" are ambiguous. Conceivably a situation might arise where carrying out the computation to four decimal places might change the result of the election in favor of one candidate, while carrying the computation out to five places might favor the other candidate. This is admittedly an extremely improbable and remote contingency, but it has been pointed out that it is mathematically possible where the election returns result in just a hairbreadth short of a tie.

Carrying out the result to three decimal points and terminating the computation there in all cases furnishes a sufficiently detailed calculation in order accurately to reflect the will of the people.

Page 3, line 10:

"The person having the greatest number of electoral votes for President shall be President."

This provides for the election of the President by a plurality vote of the electoral votes.

While the present method requires a majority of the electoral votes to elect, it must be remembered that in almost half of the elections between 1824 and 1948, inclusive, the successful presidential candidate was a plurality and not a majority choice in terms of popular votes.

Accordingly, it becomes immediately apparent that if the electoral votes accurately reflect the popular vote (which they do not under the present unit-rule system), these candidates could not have been elected for lack of a majority. There would have been no majority of electoral votes.

To illustrate: In the 1948 elections, the electoral vote was distributed as follows: Truman, 303; Dewey, 189; Thurmond, 39. Assuming that citizens had voted in precisely the same numbers and in the same manner, the new system, had it been in effect in the 1948 elections, would have distributed the electoral votes as follows: Truman, 258.0; Dewey, 221.4; Thurmond, 38.6; Wallace, 9.4; others, 1.8.

Hence, Mr. Truman, with 258.0 electoral votes, would have lacked the necessary majority of 266, but would, of course, have been elected President because of having received a plurality.

It will be remembered, in this connection, that Mr. Truman did not have a majority of the popular vote. He had 49.5 percent. This is mentioned here to emphasize how the proposed method of counting the electoral vote more nearly corresponds to the popular vote.

Election by plurality introduces no novel theory into American elections. Indeed, election by majority is the exception rather than the rule. We elect local officials, State legislatures, Governors, Representatives, and Senators by plurality. In fact, it has been pointed out that in actuality we elect the President today on a plurality basis, because it is a mere plurality of the popular votes of a State which determines to whom all the electoral votes of that State shall go. This is, indeed, putting almost an undue premium on the plurality principle, for the rewards of the bare—or photo-finish—plurality are all out of proportion under the unit-rule method of distributing electoral votes.

As the electoral vote is made more exactly to reflect the popular vote, the margin of difference between the candidates in electoral votes—is bound to diminish in size. Accordingly, it must be expected that comparatively few candidates (except in true landslides) will receive a clear majority of electoral votes under the proposed system. Indeed, to insist upon a majority to elect would mean frequent inconclusive elections. The only feasible ways to resolve such deadlocks would be either by having run-off elections, which on a national scale would be expensive, delaying, confusing, and possibly volatile, or by an election in Congress, a procedure against which many arguments could be made.

"If two or more persons shall have an equal and the highest number of such votes, then the one for whom the highest number of popular votes were cast shall be President."

This provision is purely a perfecting precautionary measure to avoid any possibility of deadlocks. It is certainly virtually inconceivable that a tie vote could occur, but this provision is designed to take care of such a remote contingency.

One of the most important phases of a good system of electing a President is to have a method that will give, as nearly as possible, absolute assurance that the election will result in the election of candidate. Great refinements are justified if necessary to create a certainty of election in every such contest.

If such a thing were possible that there should result an exact tie in the electoral vote, then a decision by giving the election to the candidate who received the greatest number of popular votes would undoubtedly lead to the selection of the President.

It will be observed that the above provisions eliminate the possibility of there being a deadlock which would take the decision to the House of Representatives. The provision in the Constitution requiring the umpirage of the House is no longer necessary and is done away with entirely.

In any event, the twentieth amendment provides an additional method to break a deadlock in case of the failure to elect one of the candidates. In substance, the twentieth amendment authorizes the Congress to provide for filling vacancies in the office of President when, for any reason, there may be no qualified person to act. That would be the case if no President were elected, or if the elected President, because of death or for any other reason, fails to qualify.

Page 3, line 15:

"The Vice President shall be likewise elected at the same time and in the same manner and subject to the same provisions, as the President."

This provision is self-explanatory.

Page 3, line 17:

"But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States."

Paragraph 4 of section 1, article II requires citizenship by birth for eligibility to the Presidency. Persons who have not attained the age of 35 and have not been 14 years a resident within the United States are also ineligible.

Inasmuch as this amendment would repeal the twelfth amendment, the last sentence of which provides that no person ineligible for President can be Vice President, it becomes necessary to include the above language in order to maintain the same eligibility as the Constitution now requires.

Page 3, line 20:

"SEC. 2. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 1, article II, of the Constitution and the twelfth article of amendment to the Constitution are hereby repealed."

Paragraph 1 of section 1 of article II is the same as the existing provision except that the words "be elected as follows" are stricken out and under the terms of the amendment the words "be elected as provided in the Constitution" are substituted. The original Constitution provided for the election of the President under article II. The twelfth amendment was subsequently added to supplement the provisions for the election. So paragraph 1 is repealed and reenacted simply to give it its proper place and to make the paragraph conform to the newer arrangement of the related provisions.

Paragraph 2, section 1, article II, provides for the appointment of electors. Inasmuch as the electors would be abolished by this proposed amendment, that paragraph would no longer be applicable.

(It should be remembered, in passing, that the Constitution uses the word "elector" in two different meanings—in some places it means presidential elector; in others it means individual voter. Although this use of the word in two different meanings may be confusing to the unwary, nevertheless, the distinction in meaning has long been clearly established.)

Paragraph 3, section 1, article II, provides that Congress may fix the time of choosing the presidential electors and the day on which they shall vote. As the proposed amendment would abolish presidential electors, this paragraph would have no further application.

The above provision also repeals the twelfth amendment. Adopted in 1804, this amendment provided for the meeting of the presidential electors and the election of the President and Vice President by the electors and the method of counting the votes.

It carried a provision that no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President, which is the same provision carried in the amendment proposed in Senate Joint Resolution 2. Otherwise the twelfth amendment is of no practical application under the proposed amendment. It is provided, therefore, that the twelfth amendment be eliminated as dead timber.

The twelfth amendment also has a provision which prohibits the presidential electors, in voting for President and Vice President, from voting for more than one of whom "shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves." Under the electoral-college system the presidential electors are a selected group to elect the President for the Nation. This provision in article XII, in effect, instructed the electors against voting for two from the same State.

Manifestly, this provision has no practical application to the case where the voters themselves elect the President. Therefore, this provision is eliminated by the repeal of the twelfth amendment.

Senate Joint Resolution 2, section 3 reads:

"This article shall take effect on the 10th day of February following its ratification."

This provision recognized that the amendment, if adopted, should go into effect sufficiently in advance of the first election to which it would apply as a matter of convenience to the States in adjusting their laws to the new system of election.

This provision would leave at least 8 months.

The States should not find it difficult to adjust their election laws to a simpler system of voting directly for the President, without the intervention of the electoral college. The problem as to the proper length of time to allow the States to adjust themselves is a discretionary matter, and any time in advance that would permit reasonable convenience for the change of these laws would serve the purpose.

Senate Joint Resolution 2, section 4, provides:

"This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States within 7 years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to add this statement: I have been asked by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska and by many other persons regarding the mechanical application of this proposition and what would have occurred in past campaigns if this proposal had been in effect.

It cannot be too strongly emphasized that while it is, of course, easy to apply the amendment retroactively—by adjusting the new rules to the old figures—it is useful to do so only as a means of illustrating how it would have operated mechanically. One cannot assume—as some have, erroneously—that citizens would have voted identically or in the same volume under this new system as they actually did vote under the existing procedure.

Indeed, had this amendment been in effect in the past, the whole composition of the popular vote would have been different. Candidates and issues would have been different. Campaigning would have been carried all over the 48 States instead of being concentrated in a few key pivotal States. Interest in the elections in the so-called one-party areas would have been greater. The stay-at-home vote would doubtless have been much smaller because of the realization that every vote for President would count.

I say that, Mr. President, because I wish to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a tabulation showing how the popular vote of 1948 actually was translated into electoral votes under the present system and how the same popular votes would have been translated into electoral votes under Senate Joint Resolution 2.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOTES

1. Governor Thurmond, States' Rights candidate, polled 1,169,312 popular votes and received 39 electoral votes. Under S. J. Res. 2, he would have received 38.6 electoral votes.

2. Henry Wallace, Progressive candidate, polled 1,157,100 popular votes and received no electoral votes. Under S. J. Res. 2, he would have received 9.4 electoral votes.

3. Other candidates (Socialist, etc.) polled 279,668 popular votes and received no electoral votes. Under S. J. Res. 2, they would have received 1.8 electoral votes.

4. Division of a State's electoral vote would be carried to 3 decimal points.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to repeat that if the proposed amendment had been in effect the popular vote would not have been cast in the same way.

Mr. President, I now conclude. This is an amendment which I believe would give a more truly national character to both our major parties, and would greatly enhance and invigorate the two-party system in the United States. It would neither help nor hurt either party. It is sponsored by Senators from both parties, representing all sections of the country.

It would eliminate completely any possibility of an election being thrown into the House of Representatives; it would establish the constitutional right of the people to direct vote, and it would do away with the so-called unit-rule system of counting electoral votes whereby the candidate receiving a plurality of the popular vote in any given State is credited with all the electoral votes of that State regardless of how small the plurality may be.

I believe that upon careful study Senators of both parties will conclude that it simply eliminates restraints on the two-party system as a whole, and thus opens up the field for imaginative and courageous political leadership in the future, the ultimate advantage of which none of us can predict and which challenges the imagination. That is what I hope for; but, as a minimum, I say it is a vitally important measure to eliminate the dangers in the present system which might some day have fateful and perilous consequences for our country.

WHAT THE HISS TRIAL ACTUALLY MEANS

Mr. MUNDT obtained the floor.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield without his losing the right to the floor?

Mr. MUNDT. If I may retain the floor, I am happy to yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the parliamentary suggestion of the absence of a quorum be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, throughout the trial of Alger Hiss, since his indictment by the grand jury in New York, I have refrained from discussing the far-flung aspects of the Chambers-Hiss hearings and investigation by the House Committee on Un-American Activities—an investigation and public hearing which has now resulted in the trial and conviction of Alger Hiss by a jury of his peers in New York City.

After sitting as a member of the House Committee on Un-American Activities throughout all the hearings, and after serving as chairman of the special subcommittee that handled the espionage phases—the so-called pumpkin papers—of the Hiss case, I was convinced in my mind that Alger Hiss was a faithless public servant who permitted his zeal for communism to induce him to betray his country. However, like all Americans, I believe every man is entitled to his day in court, and so, even after his indictment by the grand jury, I decided not to discuss the deep significance of this unfortunate affair until the verdict of the jury was in.

Now, however, Alger Hiss has been found guilty after a fair, full, and impartial trial and after being given every conceivable opportunity to produce witnesses and testimony to substantiate his protestations of innocence. Undoubtedly, Hiss will finally receive a penitentiary sentence for his treachery, but the public interest would be inadequately served and the vast expenditures of time, effort, and money scarcely justified if all that America were to gain from this experience were to be that one high Government official was being punished for telling falsehoods under oath concerning the espionage activities in which he was engaged through the delivery of highly classified State Department documents to a paid Communist functionary by the name of Whittaker Chambers. It is with the hope that all conscientious and patriotic American citizens may have their attention focused upon some of the pertinent problems of our time as a consequence of the strange and sordid chain of circumstances which have brought Alger Hiss before the bar of justice confronted by the verdict of guilty that I have decided to address myself to this significant sequence of events today.

Mr. President, to recognize the Alger Hiss conviction in its proper proportion, we must realize that except for a stupid statute on our laws permitting the statute of limitations for his crimes to expire in 3 years, Alger Hiss would have been found guilty of treachery and treason instead of for the crime of perjury. It must be clearly understood that the perjury for which Alger Hiss was convicted was his lying under oath about the fact that he was consorting with Whittaker Chambers during a specified period of history and, on his second count of guilty, that he was lying under oath when he denied that he had smuggled State Department secret documents from his post of duty and delivered them to Whittaker Chambers at the time when he was known to be a Communist functionary under the pay of an alien creed and cause. Thus this trial dealt with no ordinary falsehood but it convicted Alger Hiss of lying when he denied that he was working against the security of his country and the maintenance of our way of life by conspiring with his Communist associates to betray his country and to decrease our ability to preserve our peaceful independence as a God-fearing republic of freemen.

Unless the real magnitude of the crime involved is understood there is small likelihood that Americans will draw from this history-making case the lessons so essential if we are not to have a repetition of such incidents and perhaps have our country weakened and embroiled by faithless men in high office to the point where neither our peace nor our security can be preserved.

Let me next emphasize, Mr. President, that despite the fact that I concluded early in the testimony before the House Committee on Un-American Activities that Alger Hiss was evading the truth and endeavoring to cover his past associations with the Communist apparatus of the State Department, I am not one of those who gets any gratification from the fact that it was necessary to ferret him out, expose him to the public, and to bring him to the bar of justice. In fact, I cannot help but feel sorry for a young man having all the educational and family advantages of Alger Hiss who so perverts his talents and deceives his friends as to use his admitted talents and abilities to disserve rather than to serve the country of his origin. But sympathizing with his family and feeling sorry for the individual human being who is the center of this case, as I do, cannot compel me now, as it could not induce me when I was confronted with the ugly task of having to head the subcommittee that brought his faithlessness to light, to refrain from pointing up the issues involved, the situations disclosed, and the future courses of action which it seems to me greatly exceed in importance the fate of any individual in America. It is easy, human, and natural to sympathize with the family of Alger Hiss and to feel sorry for the man himself, but it is impossible and unreasonable to condone his activities and to ignore their importance and significance and the part they may have played in shaping the history of the world.

Let us go now to a review of the activities and developments which led first to the indictment of Alger Hiss by the grand jury in New York and finally to his conviction through a finding of guilty by the trial jury in the verdict which was pronounced last Saturday afternoon.

The name of Alger Hiss first came into the public hearings and his Communist activities were first disclosed to the public view when Whittaker Chambers, former $30,000-a-year member of the editorial staff of Time magazine, testified before the House Committee on Un-American Activities in the Ways and Means Committee room of the New House Office Building on the morning of Tuesday, August 3, 1948. In addition to the junior Senator from South Dakota, who was the presiding chairman at that hearing, there were present Representative John McDowell, of Pennsylvania; Representative Richard M. Nixon, of California; Representative John E. Rankin, of Mississippi; Representative J. Hardin Peterson, of Florida; and Representative J. Edward Hébert, of Louisiana. The chief investigator of the Un-American Activities Committee, Robert E. Stripling, whose contribution to the cause of freedom and against the success of the conspiratorial Communist apparatus, I may say, were both great and many during his tenure of service as chief investigator of the committee, was present serving as our chief interrogator, and he was accompanied by the following members of his staff: Louie Russell, William Wheeler, Donald T. Appell, and A. S. Poore.

Early in his sworn testimony before the committee that first morning, Whittaker Chambers made the following statement with reference to the communistic conspiratorial apparatus to which he had been attached here in Washington as intermediary for his Communist overlords in New York and Russia. Chambers said:

> It was an underground organization of the United States Communist Party developed to the best of my knowledge by Harold Ware, one of the sons of the Communist leader known as Mother Bloor. I knew it at its top level—a group of seven or so men, from among whom in later years certain of Miss Bentley's organizations were apparently recruited.

Mr. President, it will be recalled that the Miss Bentley to whom Whittaker Chambers has referred was Miss Elizabeth Bentley, whom our committee had previously investigated and interrogated with the result that it was established that Miss Bentley had earlier held a position similar to that of Whittaker Chambers as a courier and intermediary for the American flank of the international Communist conspiracy. It was Miss Bentley, many Senators may recall, who "developed," to use the Communist vernacular, one W. K. Remington, who was, as it was disclosed by the Ferguson committee of the Senate, in charge of making important decisions as to what type of critical materials should be exported to Russia at the same time he was associating with Miss Bentley and cooperating with her Communist assignment here in Washington. It was also Miss Bentley who, as a voluntary agent for the FBI, later received $2,000 from Anatole Gromal, of the Russian Embassy, for services rendered the cause of the Russian Communists through her contacts and influence with Communists strategically placed in the Government of the United States. Miss Bentley received this $2,000 for services rendered which she turned over to the FBI, and it was subsequently impounded.

Now, continuing with the quotation of Whittaker Chambers that first morning when he appeared before the House Committee on Un-American Activities:

> The head of the underground group at the time I knew it was Nathan Witt, an attorney for the National Labor Relations Board, later, John Abt became the leader. Lee Pressman was also a member of this group as was Alger Hiss, who, as a member of the State Department, later organized the conferences at Dumbarton Oaks, San Francisco, and the United States side of the Yalta Conference. The purpose of this group at that time was not primarily espionage. Its original purpose was the Communist infiltration of the American Government. But espionage was certainly one of its eventual objectives.

I emphasize that, Mr. President, because some of us may naively believe that when a Communist is placed in the Government his only reason for being there is to ferret out Government secrets and place them in the hands of Communists. Quite the contrary is true, as testified to by Whittaker Chambers before the Committee on Un-American Activities. Their primary objective in placing Communists and Communist sympathizers in Government positions is to influence American policy so that the entire policy of this great Republic may be diverted so as to aid and give comfort to the Soviet rather than to serve the cause of freedom in this country.

Mr. President, as events of history have unfolded, it is altogether probable that serious as were the espionage activities of this little group of disloyal men working in this Chambers Communist apparatus, its most devastating work against the cause of freedom was carried out by the manner in which these talented and brilliant but perverted minds made their influence felt in forming policies in the Roosevelt administration of that day and era.

A little later that morning, Mr. Chambers was asked for additional names of members of his apparatus here in Washington, at which time he added on page 567 of the hearings the names of Henry Collins, then in the Department of Agriculture, and Donald Hiss, the young man who after terminating his service, became a partner in the law firm of Dean Acheson, where the two were associated together until Mr. Acheson was confirmed as Secretary of State, at which time he told the committee he was severing completely his relationship with the law firm of which he was a senior partner.

Long before our committee was aware of the fact that Alger Hiss was operating a transmission belt ferrying State Department secrets out of their security files and into the hands of the Russians, via Whittaker Chambers, it was developed that Alger Hiss had held many important positions in Government permitting him to exercise vast influence at Dumbarton Oaks, at the San Francisco Conference, and most significantly and most tragically at the Yalta Conference where he served as a personal adviser and assistant to President Roosevelt.

It was also developed that part of his career in the State Department was devoted to an assignment in the far eastern division where it seems entirely probable that his influence helped in the formation of a policy and the staffing of a section of the State Department which has helped bring about the entire subjugation of China by the Communist forces directed from Moscow. In any one of these positions, Alger Hiss was in a position to render sufficient service to the cause of communism and to the defeat of sound American policy, to do almost irreparable damage to the security and the best interests of the United States. In any one of those positions, his influence could have been exerted to that dangerous degree—functioning as he did in four strategic locations during his career in the State Department.

It is impossible to estimate or perhaps overemphasize the complete sum total of the disservice rendered by Hiss to the cause of freedom and his assistance to the Communists who now threaten our interests and freedoms at every point around the globe. Mr. President, history may never show and our citizens may never completely understand the full significance of the part played by Alger Hiss and those brought into Government as friends of his, or his classmates, or his associates, in the determination of daily decisions in foreign policy which, added together, formed the matrix of developments beginning at Yalta and stemming out to boundaries which are yet untouched and undefinable.

It is now a matter of public record, however, that the House Committee on Un-American Activities gave Alger Hiss a full and free opportunity to appear before the committee, at which time he denied every statement and every charge and every accusation made by Whittaker Chambers. He even went so far as to say he had never seen the man or known a man resembling Mr. Chambers, that he had never known anybody by the name of Chambers, nor had he known a man who could conceivably be mistaken for Whittaker Chambers.

Subsequent testimony, however, clearly demonstrated the inaccuracy and unreliability of the denials made by Alger Hiss.

On August 25, months before the discovery of the microfilms and photostatic documents which finally led to the complete collapse of the Hiss denials, I endeavored to summarize the progress of the testimony, so as to provide Mr. Hiss with yet another opportunity, in the remote event that he were innocent, to clear himself from the fate which faced him as a consequence of the tangled web of contradictions and falsehoods he had fashioned around himself by the testimony which he gave before our committee. Let me quote, from page 1157 of the printed hearings, a summary I had made of developments up to that point in the case:

> Mr. MUNDT. Now, Mr. Hiss, these hearings are drawing to a close, and I want to review with you briefly, as briefly as I can, the reactions of just one member of this committee to the testimony in which you are involved; and after I conclude my statement, which I shall make without interruption, you may then make the statements that you have to make, without interruption. But I wish you would take notes on what I am going to say, so that you can correct me in your statement where you think I am in error, or where you wish to set my trend of thinking right, where you think it is deviating from a logical course.
> We started out in these hearings simply to get at the truth concerning espionage activities in Government. One of our early witnesses, Mr. Whittaker Chambers mentioned your name and the name of your brother, Donald Hiss, in connection with other individuals, most of whom have refused under oath to deny the charges or to deny the fact that they are members of the Communist Party.
>
> You suggested, when you first came before the committee, that in an effort to get at the facts, we take certain steps, one of which was to go to the records, wherever the records are available. We have done that, and we have spread those records, wherever available, into this testimony.
> You suggested that you be confronted with your accuser. We have done that, both in executive session and in open session.
>
> You suggested that we check all the verifiable details, which we have done.
>
> Your testimony that first day was that, to the best of your recollection, you did not know Whittaker Chambers, and that the picture which was presented to you by counsel, Mr. Stripling, did not bring back the memory of anybody whom you had seen, by that picture.

The next step in this proceeding was—and I might say here that you made a very fine impression on me, as acting chairman, that first day. I was inclined to be in your corner, from the standpoint of accepting the validity of what you said.

You were given every consideration by the committee and not cross-examined very clearly or carefully by the committee on that first day, and that, despite the fact that, as a member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, I had frequently heard the name of Alger Hiss bandied around as having possible Communist connections in years past. I never had seen you; I never had met you; I do not believe your name had ever passed my lips or had been written by me in any correspondence up to that time. But it was, as you have later testified, rather common scuttlebutt, should we say, around Washington that one Alger Hiss had been labeled by some as a fellow traveler or Communist. The most recent indication of that is a statement in the morning paper, by George E. Sokolsky. I will read you just two paragraphs from his column, These Days. It says: "Way back in 1941, I came across the existence of the Ware group——" that is the Harold Ware whom you testified that you knew—"the Ware group in Washington, who were engaged in placing Communists in the most critical positions in the Federal Government. I was then told who the original 10 were, and among them was mentioned Alger Hiss."

In spite of that, after hearing your testimony, I was convinced that either Whittaker Chambers must have been falsifying before this committee or else there was a mistaken identity. It seemed doubtful, then, that you were lying.

So, I asked a subcommittee to go to New York for the purpose of interviewing Mr. Chambers to see whether, by some chance, he had confused Alger Hiss with someone else, whether or not he could substantiate his statement that he knew Alger Hiss, and, if so, how well, and what details he could supply, which are verifiable. He supplied a great many details, all of which are in the executive testimony, which has been released to the press today, and are available to you.

Then, you were again interviewed in Washington, and at that time you verified these same details, which were given us by Mr. Chambers, intimate details about your family, about your hobby, about your pets, about the decorations in the room; and after verifying a number of these details, you said, "I might have known a man who had access to that information," and you said that man, if you knew him at all, was one George Crosley.

The next day the committee went to New York City and brought you and Mr. Chambers together, at which time you identified him positively; you identified him as the George Crosley, but you said then that you sublet him your apartment. You said then that you gave or sold him an automobile. You said then that you had him living with you several days in your own home. You said then that you had also seen him at some time later than the time when he occupied your apartment, and you said then that you had made a series of small loans.

I think this is important, for the reason that, strangely enough, there are in this country people who, after Mr. Hiss has been convicted of perjury, still seem to feel it inconceivable that a man who looks so smooth and so intelligent and speaks such an effective Harvard accent, could be considered guilty of such a charge.

I point this out to call attention to the fact that the testimony of Alger Hiss on Alger Hiss is in itself sufficient to demonstrate his connections and his relationships with Whittaker Chambers, the Communist. Regardless of what might be decided at any trial or regardless of what any appellate process might disclose, we have the sworn testimony of Alger Hiss himself that he was a close associate and friend of, and indeed lived in the same apartment with Whitaker Chambers at the time when Chambers was a paid espionage agent for the Russians and the Communists, and he knew Chambers so well that finally he said the only way he could recognize him for sure was by an examination of his dentures; and Chambers had to open his mouth and let Hiss explore the fillings of his teeth before Hiss would venture to say, "That is the man I knew."

Mr. President, I think the time has long since passed when we can afford to have working for us, in positions of high trust in the Federal Government, Communists and Communist sympathizers so well known to each other that they recognize each other in the darkness by the fillings of their teeth. That is too close a relationship for Communists or Communist sympathizers and highly placed employees of our Government to have. But it is precisely the relationship which Mr. Hiss admitted he had with Mr. Chambers.

I continue now with the summary of the testimony, before Mr. Hiss made his reply:

We have tried since then to verify further the testimony of both yourself and Mr. Chambers. We have been unable to find anybody who knows or who has seen George Crosley. You have been unable to produce anybody for us who knows or has seen George Crosley.

Therefore, in summary, it would seem to me that you have left me, as one member of the committee, in this position—and I came back from South Dakota by air to get at the facts of this case because, as I say, when you first appeared before the committee, you left me with the feeling that you were telling the truth and that you were not concealing or evading information which we needed to have in this committee.

Now, I find that while you said earlier that you did not know Mr. Whittaker Chambers, or any man answering that description or looking like him, it is now established testimony that you did know him and that you do know him.

There is some doubt about the name, but there is no question about your having known the individual, and I find that while you said in the testimony that you were sure anybody who could have lived in your house over a period of time would be somebody whose picture you would be able to identify, but I find that you were unable to identify from the picture, although you now testify that this man did live in your home over a period of days.

You said that you gave Chambers your car, that you sold or traded it to him, and now the written records show that you signed a transfer of your car to the Cherner Motor Co., or else to one William T. Rosen.

You testified that you had given money to Crosley in the nature of a loan. He testified that he had received money from you in the nature of payment of Communist dues.

The points in agreement, as they looked to me, are these:

You knew this man; you knew him very well; you knew him so well that you even trusted him with your apartment; you let him use your furniture; you let him use or gave him your automobile; you think that you probably took him to New York; you bought him lunches in the Senate Restaurant; you had him staying in your home when it was inconvenient for him to stay in the apartment and made him a series of small loans. There seems no question about that.

In other words, there seems no question about your associations with a man who told this committee that he associated closely with you.

The points in disagreement, Mr. Hiss, as I see them, are these:

Were you or were you not a Communist? This committee never had any illusions that we would be able to prove definitely whether or not you are a Communist, because in dealing with people charged with being Communists over a period of years, we have found that those who are guilty, refused to admit it and dodged the question or deliberately lied.

We know that we cannot get the records of the Communist Party. We cannot get their membership cards, but that was a point we could not hope to establish by verifiable evidence, and it is now a point in dispute.

The second point in dispute is that were you a member of the so-called Ware group who were alleged to have worked together to promote their associates into key positions of Government? You say you were not. Mr. Chambers says that you were. Mr. Chambers said that you were and that you were associated in this activity with John Abt, Lee Pressman, Nathan Witt, Henry Collins, Harold Ware, and Charles Kramer. You admit that you knew John Abt, Lee Pressman, Nathan Witt, Henry Collins, Harold Ware, and Charles Kramer, but you did not know whether or not they were Communists and that whether or not they were, that you were not associated with them in an effort to promote your associates into key Government positions.

There is one other point in dispute, and that is, while you both admit this association at the time when it was supposed to have taken place, Mr. Chambers said that you knew him as Carl, and you say that you knew him as Crosley. To me, that is not a very important distinction. The important thing is how close your associations were with this man, who is admittedly a Communist at that time.

He is a Communist functionally. Whether he was living in your home as George Crosley or Carl or Whittaker Chambers is comparatively immaterial. The important thing to me, Mr. Hiss, is that he was living in your home, that you were associating with him, that you were taking him out in the car, that you were letting him use your car, that you were letting him use your apartment, and making him loans and having associations with him of that nature.

In an endeavor to determine the credibility of two witnesses whose testimony conflicts on so many of these points, which are still in dispute, we endeavored to establish that by checking, first, Mr. Chambers' testimony to see whether or not it would stand up, to see whether or not you were an ornithologist, to see whether or not you had a car which had a hand windshield wiper, to see whether or not he had this rather intimate association with you, which the testimony of both of you now conclusively proves did exist.

We also endeavored to check the fact as to whether he lived in your home or spent time in your home, as he said he did. Now, both of you testify to the fact that that actually took place.

We endeavored to verify other aspects of his testimony, about transfers that your son made in school, about certain intimate details of the furniture and material in your home, and on every point on which we have been able to verify, on which we have had verifiable evidence before us, the testimony of Mr. Chambers has stood up. It stands unchallenged. Most of it you admit, although you place understandably a different interpretation upon it from what he has.

You, on the other hand, have also supplied some verifiable data. You have talked about an automobile; you have talked about these pictures of identification; you have described the conditions under which he occupied your home; but in the matter of the car your testimony is clearly refuted by the tangible evidence of the sales slips from the Cherner Motor Co., by the registration material.

On some of the other items your testimony is clouded by a strangely deficient memory. You can recall vividly certain very specific details, but you cannot recall at all whether this automobile that meant so much to you was ever given to Crosley and returned to you, whether you sold it to him, or what the eventual disposition of this car was; and that car plays a very important part, as does the subletting of the apartment in the whole testimony, because in testing the credibility of your testimony and that of Mr. Chambers we have to rely on those pieces of evidence which are verifiable, and those happen to be verifiable items.

We proceed on the conclusion that if either one of you is telling the truth on the verifiable data, that you are telling the truth on all of it. And if either one of you is concealing the truth from the committee on verifiable data, it points out that you are concealing from us the truth on the points that we cannot prove.

In our committee report following this phase of the Hiss case—a report which it should be emphasized was signed unanimously by both the Democrats and the Republicans on our committee, and I am going to have more to say about that as I get to some of the more important aspects of the case since every committee report was signed unanimously by Democrats and Republicans alike. We said—and I quote from the report:

Chambers testified on August 3 that Hiss was a member of the Communist underground group of Government workers during the period 1934 to 1937 when Chambers was serving as a Communist Party functionary in Washington. On August 5 Hiss categorically denied the charges of Chambers' that he was or ever had been a member of the Communist Party and further denied ever having known Chambers or "having laid eyes upon him." As a result of exhaustive investigation by the committee's staff and of hours of executive session testimony from Hiss, Chambers, and all others who had information concerning the conflicting stories, Hiss finally admitted on August 17 for the first time that he actually had known Chambers as George Crosley, during the period in question. As a result of the hearings and investigations which have been conducted by the committee to date, these facts have been clearly established.

I ask unanimous consent that the statement of facts set forth in this report be printed in the RECORD, at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. There is no doubt whatever but that Chambers from 1931 to 1938 was a paid functionary of the Communist Party and that from 1934 to 1937 he operated as a member of the Communist underground among Government workers in Washington.

2. The refusal of Nathan Witt, John Abt, Henry Collins, Lee Pressman, and Victor Perlo to answer any questions concerning their activities as members of this group on the ground of self-incrimination and to answer as to whether or not they were members of the Communist Party during that period is in itself strong corroborative evidence for Chambers' story.

3. By his own admission Hiss knew Chambers for a period of at least 10 months during the period in question and possibly longer. It is also clear that Hiss knew Chambers very well as indicated by his admission that he sublet his furnished apartment to him, that he met him on various occasions for lunch, that on at least one occasion he gave him a ride to New York from Washington, that for several days the Chambers family visited in the Hiss home, and that he loaned money to Chambers, and that he gave him an automobile.

4. While admitting that he knew Chambers, Hiss still denies that he knew Chambers was a Communist, and that he, Hiss, was a member of the Communist Party at any time.

Mr. MUNDT. In supplementing the foregoing statements our unanimous committee report of August 27, 1948, went on to say in summary:

1. Despite his denial that he has ever been a member of the Communist Party or had any friends who were Communists, Hiss has admitted knowing and associating with Harold Ware, Nathan Witt, John Abt, Henry Collins, Lee Pressman, and Whittaker Chambers, all of whom are either known or admitted members of the Communist Party, or who have refused to answer the question as to whether they were members of the Communist Party on the ground of self-incrimination. It stretched the credulity of the committee to believe that Hiss could have known these people, including Chambers, as well as he did without at some time suspecting that they were members of the Communist Party.

2. The committee believes that Mr. Hiss was not completely forthright in his testimony before the committee on August 5 when he failed to tell the committee that he noted a familiarity about the features of Whittaker Chambers when a picture of Chambers was shown to him. He has since admitted that he told several friends before the hearings of his noting this familiarity but when shown a picture of Chambers he deliberately created the impression that the face meant nothing to him whatever. It is hard to believe that Hiss could have known Chambers as well as he admits he knew Crosley without being able to recognize the picture which was shown him during the hearing of August 5.

3. Hiss has either failed or refused to tell the committee the whole truth concerning the disposition of his 1929 Ford automobile. It is inconceivable that a man would not remember whether he had given a car away twice or at all and it is just as inconceivable that he would not recall whether a person to whom he had given the automobile had later returned it to him.

4. Despite the fact that Hiss says he knew Chambers under the name of Crosley, a thorough investigation by the committee has failed to date to find any person who knew him by that name during the period in question. The committee believes that the burden is upon Hiss to establish that Chambers actually went under the name of Crosley at the time he knew him and that Hiss knew Crosley as a free-lance writer rather than as the admitted Communist functionary which Chambers actually was during that period.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. First, I want to compliment the Senator upon the very able speech he is making, in which he is revealing evidence elicited through his work on the Committee on Un-American Activities. One thing which has always aroused my curiosity is the disclosure of how Whittaker Chambers came to give this evidence. If it is not a violation of any of the committee's secrets, I should like to inquire, Does the Senator know whether Whittaker Chambers came before the committee voluntarily to give evidence, or how the committee came to get his evidence? In view of the relationship existing between the two men, which has just been explained, I wonder whether it has ever been disclosed to the public how Chambers' evidence was obtained. It has been puzzling me, and I should like to know the answer to it, if the Senator feels he is in a position to inform Senators.

Mr. MUNDT. I must say in response to the question, that, so far as I know, that information has never been disclosed or revealed. I see no good reason why it should not be revealed, however, because I know there is a considerable amount of misunderstanding throughout the country about Whittaker Chambers. Some people have assumed that he went into the matter with malice aforethought, in an effort to "get" someone with whom he had formerly been associated, when, as a matter of fact, it is pretty clearly demonstrated by the record that he had previously made the information available to Adolph Berle, who was then in the State Department; that, through the President's Secretary, Mr. McIntyre, he had made the information available to the White House; and that it had been made available to the Department of Justice.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. MUNDT. I shall be glad to yield in a moment. Obviously it sounded like a pretty preposterous and fantastic story to some of these people, I think, and the first time that anyone on our committee was contacted about the evidence was when I received a call at my apartment one night, shortly after midnight, from a friend of mine in New York, at a time when the committee was working on the Miss Elizabeth Bentley case. The friend said, "Karl, you are working on a rather important case, I presume, in connection with the Miss Bentley inquiry, but you are really missing the big bus." I said, "What is the big bus?" He said, "The most important one is, if you could contact Whittaker Chambers." I said, "Who in the world is Whittaker Chambers?" I did not have any idea who he was. He went on tc tell me something about him. He explained his contacts; he knew something about the information Chambers had previously given the FBI; and he said, "Your committee might do a more thorough job on this phase of the matter. Why do you not contact him?"

I went to the committee and talked to Mr. Stripling, who sent an investigator to the office of Time in New York City to contact Mr. Chambers, who agreed to testify. None of us then realized, of course, the far-flung ramifications his testimony would have, except, when he brought in certain names, we felt we had a duty as a congressional committee not to cast them aside or ignore them, as it appears had been done by others who had heard about it, but to follow the thing through, to see which of these two distinguished Americans was falsifying the evidence—one, a $20,000 president of the Carnegie Peace Foundation, the other, a $30,000 editor of Time magazine. Certainly, we thought the public was entitled to have the thing ventilated, and brought to a conclusion; and so we served a subpena on Chambers. He came before the committee, not voluntarily, but in response to a subpena issued by the Committee on Un-American Activities.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator. His statement is most revealing to me. It appears, then, that a subpena was served on him, and it was after the service of the subpena that Chambers came before the committee, and that his evidence was adduced before the committee. Is that correct?

Mr. MUNDT. He was in no sense a voluntary witness. He had never voluntarily approached our committee, or any member of the committee, with his offer to testify. The information came to me, as I say, from a friend in New York, who happened to have access to the fact that Adolph Berle had been tipped off some time ago. That was the first I had ever heard of it.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the Senator state when the story was supposed to have been related to the White House and to Mr. Berle in the State Department?

Mr. MUNDT. I cannot give the exact year, but it was early in 1940 or late in 1939, shortly after Chambers had broken from the apparatus. He separated himself from the apparatus and decided to reveal what he knew, at the time the von Ribbentrop-Molotov pact was signed, because then, for the first time he said, he recognized that the business in which he was engaged was detrimental to the national security of this country, in the event of war occurring between the United States and Germany. He knew about the von Ribbentrop-Molotov pact. He knew about the Communist apparatus he had established in the State Department, and he decided that in the event of a war possibly with Russia and Germany on the same side against us, we could not afford to have the Government of the United States permeated with disloyalty. That was when he went to Mr. Berle, and the information was sent to Mr. McIntyre, of the White House staff.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Did it ever come to the attention of the Senator that when the story was related to the State Department and to the White House Mr. Chambers had requested that they waive prosecution against himself and that they wait until the statute of limitations had expired in connection with Mr. Chambers' crime?

Mr. MUNDT. At no time did we have any such testimony before our committee, and I should be very much inclined to doubt that, because at no time did Mr. Chambers, unlike Julian Wadleigh, inquire about the statute of limitations, or inquire about his own status when he testified before the committee.

Mr. FERGUSON. Has the Senator any information as to why this case was not taken up at the time by the State Department, the White House, and the FBI?

Mr. MUNDT. Yes. We have direct testimony on that from Mr. Berle himself.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does the Senator intend to cover that by what he has to say?

Mr. MUNDT. I intend to cover it in some of the insertions which I expect to place in the RECORD. Mr. Berle understood the President thought it was a little bit preposterous, and that the President was not prepared to accept it.

Continuing, Mr. President, I think it is interesting to recall that in those days of August 1948 the House Committee on Un-American Activities was confronted with perhaps the most formidable resistance from high places and, in fact, probably had to pursue its course against more sizable obstacles than ever before confronted a congressional committee. Not only was there a united chorus in the left-wing press of America and a steady tattoo of the most critical and castigating statements from columnists and commentators who were former friends and associates of Alger Hiss, but our committee suffered severely from obstructive tactics in the executive agencies and from a persistent noncooperation, because of which it was found necessary to include, by unanimous action of our committee, mind you, the following observations in our report of August 27, 1948. I read from page 1354 of the report, for the permanent RECORD, a strange passage from the investigating committee's report, a passage unanimously subscribed to by the Democratic as well as the Republican members of the committee.

We could not secure cooperation from the White House, and we had to do this in simple justice to the American people. The subheading is "Obstructive tactics by the White House," and the committee's statement is as follows:

> The committee's investigation of espionage among Government workers has been hampered at every turn by the refusal of the executive branch of the Government to cooperate in any way with the investigation due to the President's loyalty freeze order. Not only have the executive agencies refused to turn over to the committee the loyalty files of the suspected members of the spy rings but they have even gone so far as to refuse to turn over the employment records of these individuals. The committee can see no excuse whatever for such arbitrary action since it is obvious that turning over employment records would in nowise involve disclosing sources of information or confidential data. Had the executive agencies of the Government cooperated with the committee in its investigation, there is no question but what the public would now have full information concerning all the ramifications of the espionage rings. The committee had proceeded to obtain this information in every way possible and eventually will see that it is presented to the public, but the committee deplores the fact that the executive branch of the Government will in no way aid the committee in its efforts to protect the national security from those who are doing everything they can to undermine and destroy it.

The reason why that strong language was incorporated was not only because the President tried to belittle the importance of the whole investigation by referring to it insultingly as a "red herring," not once, but in two press conferences, but when we endeavored to get employment files made available to the Congress we were unsuccessful. Not yet can any Member of this body find out, for example, the names, the recommendations, and the backgrounds of persons brought into the State Department by Alger Hiss and who continued to carry on his program and purposes after he moved on to a higher position of importance.

I call attention to the fact that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this body has tried to get such files. We were not asking for loyalty files. There was no question of security involved. There was no question of maintaining confidential sources of information. I agree that confidential sources of information must be maintained. We were simply trying to ascertain what part Alger Hiss had played in connection with placing Communists in positions of influence in the Government. Up to this time the great United States Senate has no way of finding out how far the ramifications may go, because the President refuses to turn over to the Congress the files which alone can tell the story.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.
